Formidable Riot Among French Miners—Departure of Father Hyacinthe for America—Baron Haussmann's Death Denied—The London Times on the Situation.

PARIS, Oct. 9.—The Journal Officiel has the following news: A very formidable riot broke out among the miners employed by the Compagnie du Chemin de fer d'Orleans in the Department of Aveyron on Thursday last. The rioters attempted to drown the Chief Engineer of the Company in a neighboring river, but were frustrated by the efforts of the Prefect and the troops under his command. The Vice-Prefect and several other persons were wounded in this mêlée. During the night of the 7th the miners fired the general storehouses and other buildings of the Company in that neighborhood, and by the next morning the riot had assumed alarming proportions. On the morning of the 8th the miners in large force attacked the forges of the Company, but the military, which had meanwhile arrived on the ground, charged upon them, and at the same time used their firearms. Ten of the rioters were killed outright, and many others wounded. The mob then dispersed. Measures have been taken by the authorities to guard against any new outbreak.

Father HYACINTHE has gone to the United States, where he will remain two months or so.

The statement received here yesterday from Bordeaux of the death of Baron HAUSSMANN in that city, though generally credited, is now authoritatively denied.

LONDON, Oct. 9.—The Times to-day has an editorial on the state of affairs in France. The writer says the self-restraint and forbearance of M. KERATRY and his colleagues at this juncture, is an evidence of the fitness of France to control her own destinies, and we have little doubt they will reap the benefit of their moderation. Under the old empire immense fields were open to those who would work much and risk little. There was always a chance for good men and true to stand their ground firmly, though temperately. Had it been otherwise, we should not be so far as we have got, and should scarcely have heard the July message. What the Opposition wanted was union, method and patience.

The Insurrection Formidable—Citizens of Madrid Advised to Arm Themselves—The Latest Dispatches—The Revolution in Granada and Saragossa—An Outrage on Civilization.

PARIS, Oct. 9.—The Republican insurrection in Spain still continues, and the country is in a very unsettled condition. The Republicans are making very strong resistance in various parts of the country. Madrid is tranquil, but the Police authorities have advised the inhabitants of the city to arm themselves and their servants in order to defend their houses in case of a riot.

Nineteen hundred insurgents to-day surrendered to General BALDRICH. The General refuses to pardon those who have committed assassinations.

Intelligence from Granada is to the effect that the volunteers in the section have refused to disarm, and have escaped to the open country.

A body of volunteers in Saragossa fired on the troops stationed there, and a sharp fight ensued. The disturbance was finally quelled, but not until much blood had been shed.

VALLA, Oct. 9.—The insurgents in the neighborhood placed obstructions on the track of the Andalusian Railway, which caused a train of cars filled with troops to run off the track. Four of the troops were killed and many wounded.

Doctors in Accord—Medical Convention in Florence—Arnaldo Da Brescia—The Policy of France—Temper of the Times.

From Our Own Correspondent.

FLORENCE, Saturday, Sept. 25, 1869.

Among the European Conventions got together to try to mend matters, Florence has now in session its reunion of medical men. No one has a right to say that the combined wisdom of all countries, in this line, is here in consultation; but that a vast amount of learning is united no one denies. It would be tiresome to give a list of names, but among Italians that of BUFFALINI is the most eminent. Nearly all but savage nations, which manage to make shift without professional men, are here represented. How to cure the cholera, smallpox without pits, lifesaving on the battle field after improved rifles have done their most, and many difficult middles, form the themes of these discussions. The number of doctors in attendance is more than 200, and others are expected.

Meanwhile newspaper writers continue to gnaw the shell in which the Italian Ministry has encased itself. This melody of discontent with the Ministry has become chronic—a sort of seven years' itching. If you will allow me to use an expressive but somewhat vulgar comparison. Fortunately the disease is on the surface, and is not likely to reach any vital part of the system. But this absorbing theme has suddenly yielded to a new object of attention. The protest of Father HYACINTHE against the Ecumenical Council has made a sensation among all parties, and is likely to give new animation to the controversy going on with Rome. The Italian party hail the courageous and eloquent monk with enthusiasm, and are ready to take him cordially by the hand as one of the leaders in their cause. So far the prospect seems to be good for the promotion of anarchy rather than harmony in the Catholic Episcopacy by the assemblage of Bishops.

ARNALDO DA BRESCIA.

At the same time that we hear of this stop taken by Pius IX. LATTER, notice comes that the City of Brescia this voted the sum of 30,000 francs for a monument to ARNALDO, commonly known as ARNALDO DA BRESCIA. You know very well the history of this martyr; one of the most thrilling passages in the story of Church persecution, and one of the strongest proofs of the hostility of the ancestral power to freedom and reform. ARNALDO was strangled and burnt in front of the Porta del Popolo at Rome, in 1155, in the first year of the reign of the English Pope ADRIAN IV., sometimes known as Nicolas Breakspeare. ARNALDO was a monk, and had studied with ABELARD, and shared the sentiments of that remarkable man. In their time the Papacy and the Empire were disputing over Italy—on one side the ascendant party, with the principles of GREGORY VII., and on the other the Ghibellines striving for constitution. A party was formed to emancipate the people from these two masters, and ARNALDO became its most ardent leader. Animated with the spirit of freedom, he dreamed of reviving the life of the ancient Roman Republic. He preached the reform of the clergy, then sunk in every form of corruption. He advocated the despoiling of the Church of temporal benefits, carrying it back to the simplicity of apostolic times. His own life was one of extreme rigor—subsisting on the most meagre fare, and exhorting others to lean living. ARNALDO maintained that ecclesiastics as well as laymen ought to be subject to the civil power; that the clergy ought to be content with their tithes and the voluntary contributions of the faithful, and not aspire to lordships and feudal estates, such as they then held. He also set forth views of doctrine at variance with those proclaimed by authority. In consequence of such preaching, Brescia revolted against its Bishop, and the disaffection spread. Complaints against him from various quarters were sent to Rome, and ARNALDO was condemned by the Council of the Lateran in 1139; was excommunicated and banished from Italy. He went to France and afterward to Zurich, continuing his preaching against the abuses of the Church. When the Romans revolted against the Pope, ARNALDO returned to Italy. ADRIAN IV., afterward coming to power, adopted severe measures, and ARNALDO was burnt and his ashes thrown into the Tiber. Now, after seven centuries, the martyr is to be honored!

To help this project of a monument to ARNALDO, the municipal councils of various cities of Italy have voted contributions. Among these cities are Turin, Milan, Naples, Verona, Ancona and Mantova. To the surprise of many the proposal to take part in the enterprise has just been rejected in the town council of Florence, whether from a motive of petty economy, or for some other reason, I do not know; but the decision has been severely criticised, and will probably be reconsidered. The distinguished Florentine poet NICCOLINI, is the one who, in his tragedy of Arnaldo de Brescia, has done most to exalt the fame of this historic character. A dozen years ago this drama was not allowed to be put upon the stage here in Florence; it set the Papacy in such a bad light, and excited to such a degree the enthusiasm of the people.

POLICY OF FRANCE.

The proximate reunion of the Ecumenical Council, and the dubious policy of the Imperial Government toward Rome, revives the question of what is to be the future status of the Papacy. No one can doubt that LOUIS NAPOLEON would be glad to see his cousin the Cardinal, LUCIEN BONAPARTE, the successor of PIUS IX. in the Pontifical office. To bring such an end about is difficult, but by no means impossible. Nothing is more certain than that the clerical party regard the whole race of BONAPARTES with the most uncompromising animosity. Don MARGOTTI and his journal may be accepted as the just exponents of the general feeling. But if the present Pope should die, and the Emperor should live, who among the partisans of Rome would be able to hinder the naming by France of PIUS IX., the successor? NAPOLEON III. would be able to say to the College of Cardinals, accept this convenient man, or I will throw you into the arms of the King of Italy, whom you hate more bitterly than you do me, and have dared to excommunicate. To all appearances the circle of Cardinals in conclave would be as helpless for opposition as so many members of a female knitting society. With a great deal of talk about moral power, it has all along been practically acknowledged that material force, under actual circumstances, is only that which has any value. This seems to be the real case simply stated; but the bare suggestion that the Pope and Cardinal are reduced to such an extremity, makes our friends the priests purple with rage. Other results is founded in the hope that the present Pope may survive the Empire.

If Ecumenical councils had the power to restore the good old times of the wheel, the thumb, screw and the rack, we should soon have all doubts cleared away. But as the world actually finds itself, no Pope or Emperor has a hand large enough to cover the public mouth, now wide open with brawling free speech. Even His Holiness, rather against his will, has been obliged to swallow locomotives, galvanic batteries, telescopes, the printing press, and sewing and washing machines. But the case of the Pope is not so hopeless as is supposed, for it is not himself but his system which is narrow at bottom. As with a fractious child, which has long had its own way, a little force will have to be used at first, but reform will come at last.

TEMPER OF THE TIMES.

The temper of the times, as indicated by such meetings as the Congress at Lausanne and the other at Bale, is very generally taken note of. Not a few words of anxiety are let drop by official and conservative journals, in view of the latitude of doctrine declared in these now frequently radical assemblages. Society is to be pulled up by the roots, as soon as the land question is discussed, and visions of all sorts of Agrarian outrages fill the imagination and hinder sleep. The old castles, with their foundations laid in the middle Ages, tremble with the rumbling which is heard under ground. The question is an old one, and will doubtless enjoy its old age for many years yet.

In Italy the system is one of small holdings, and there is no monopoly of lands. It is a fact worth mentioning, that of late years, in the neighborhood of cities, the Jews have become purchasers of a great number of small farms and villa estates. When property of this kind is about to change hands, the children of Israel are near to put in their offers, and in a great many cases become purchasers. In every direction around Florence pleasant places will be pointed out to you as those recently acquired by the sons of Moses and Abraham. The Jew population of Florence is nearly 3,000, and the management of affairs at the Exchange is in large part in their hands, and their riches increase.

Lord Clarendon's Mission to Napoleon—The Maintenance of the Peace of Europe Sought.

Paris (Sept. 28) Correspondence Daily News.

Lord CLARENDON had a mission when he lately paid a visit to St. Cloud. The prospect of the death of NAPOLEON III., which a few weeks ago everybody was brought to consider as a more than possible contingency of eyes, let the Great Powers to consider what might be the consequences. Austria, Prussia, Russia, and England, it is said, came to an understanding as to the course which they would pursue under given circumstances, the object being to preserve peace, check the contagion of a revolution in France, and as a means conducive to those ends not to thwart German unity. Lord CLARENDON'S delicate task was to make the French Emperor aware of this agreement between the four Powers. The announcement was received, or was to be expected, by many assurances that nobody could be more desirous than the Emperor was to preserve the peace of Europe. Should the advice really be taken in good part the happiest results may be expected. Divested of diplomatic compliments, the intention of the Powers seems to have been to tell the Emperor how his hands are tied, so far as regards any attempt to combat opposition at home by the diversion of war. Consistently, every effort will doubtless be made to induce Prussia, whether on the Baden or any other question, not to give any provocation to France.

THE PANTIN TRAGEDY.

Bullet and Stabbed Parricides of After Events—Story of the Prisoner—His Arrival in Paris—Wading the Blood—Another Corpse Unearthed.

The story, as far as known, of the Pantin tragedy, has already been published in the TIMES. The mail advices should yesterday give the latest accounts of the after events. From the most reliable French and English sources we compile the following summary:

STORY OF THE PRISONER.

The three murderers (says the Journal du Havre) are JEAN KINCK, the father; GUSTAVE, his son; and a third person, who has on several occasions given himself the false name of Jean Kinck. This is the man who was so fortunately arrested yesterday at Havre by the maritime gendarme FERRAND. The real name of the criminal is TRAUPMANN. Papers found in his possession prove his identity, and show that he was a working mechanic at Roubaix. His accomplices appear to have made him one of the latter's instruments of their crime. He it was who had the mission to murder, at Paris, the execution of the affair, and to direct all the material details. Being alone in that city, he had a residence at the Hotel du Chemin de Fer du Nord, No. 13 Boulevard Denain, opposite the station. It was in his who arranged the various preparatory rendezvous, all of which were held at the Café Parisien. Moreover, he was the man who went on Sunday evening to La Villette, No. 209 Rue de Flandre, to buy of the ironmonger BELLANGER a shovel and pickax, in order to dig beforehand the grave of the victims; and it was the same person who engaged a cab to transport to a certain spot, selected beforehand for the perpetration of the crime, the unfortunate KINCK family. This was the man who, according to the prearranged plan, had to bring each of the victims, one after the other, under the knives of the two other murderers. Lastly, he was the person whose business it was to prepare the flight after the deed had been committed. For that object he had come to Havre to find some ship in which he and his accomplices might quit France. TRAUPMANN is said to have encountered at the very outset a difficulty in the execution of his horrible commission. After having caused the cab to stop at about three hundred yards from Langlois field, he invited Mme. KINCK to accompany him alone. Two of the youngest children, terrified by the darkness, cried out several times, "Mamma! Ah, mamma! We will go with you!" So that she was obliged WILLINGLY to allow them to accompany her. KINCK, the father, on seeing all at once his wife and two of his children coming up, could not repress an exclamation of terror, and turning to TRAUPMANN he exclaimed, "Ah, you wretch, you have betrayed me!" A few words spoken to him in a low voice by the other explained everything. On the instant, the father and son, together with TRAUPMANN, rushed upon their victims, and a violent struggle immediately commenced between Mme. KINCK and her executioners. The poor woman, being in the vigor of life, and stimulated by the powerful instinct of self-preservation supplied, succeeded in wresting the knife out of her husband's hand. She then turned the weapon against him, wounding him in the arm, and would doubtless have contrived, if she had had to met the other assailants, after having disarmed the ruffian, assaulted her in their turn. And so the deed of blood was accomplished. The revelations and informations hitherto collected by justice do not allow us to give precise details as to the mode of this savage tragedy. According to the assertions of TRAUPMANN, it was not he, but GUSTAVE KINCK, who went to fetch his three young brothers from the cab. On the occasion of the first interrogation, attempted at 5 o'clock in the hospital by the examining Magistrate, TRAUPMANN persisted in absolute silence, a thing which would have been imprudence to suffer so great a criminal to spend the night in one of the sleeping rooms, where measures of precaution were difficult of execution, an order came toward 6 o'clock to convey him to the prison. He was carefully wrapped up in blankets, and M. TOURNIE, the Central Commissary, accompanied him in a cab to the cell where he was to be kept in close confinement. TRAUPMANN had then a little fever, and fears were entertained that pneumonia might supervene. The next morning he was much better, and it is thought that he may soon be removed to Paris, where his presence is of great importance for the elucidation of the affair. At 9 in the morning he underwent an examination, in the course of which he made, as we are assured, a complete confession. On its side, the Government Prosecutor published a long account, a great portion of which coincides with what is given above. We select from it the following particulars: "The prisoner, when he reached the prison, declared that he would speak the next morning. He afterward asked for the examining Magistrate in order to make his disclosures in the presence of his interrogatory took place, the result of which is that individual, JEAN BAPTISTE TRAUPMANN, comes from Cernay (Seine-et-Oise.) This individual had known KINCK, the father, with whom he had worked at Roubaix, and at Paris, and whom he had lately met in the city. The latter had expressed a desire to emigrate to America, having taken vengeance on his wife, whom he accused of infidelity. The interviews of the two men were held at the Café Parisien. With a view to obviate all suspicion, TRAUPMANN had assumed the name of JEAN KINCK with the owner's consent, and went to Pantin lodging where he could, being also authorized to open all letters arriving to his assumed appellation. The son did not come to Paris at the same time as his father, but only shortly before the crime was committed. Jealous of the greater nature of the vengeance, everything was arranged between the accomplices. The woman KINCK was written to, requesting her to come to Paris. As she hesitated, a second letter was sent by TRAUPMANN, under the pretext that her husband had sprained his wrist, and announcing that the latter had bought a house at Pantin. An appointment was made at the station, where she was to arrive at 10 o'clock on Sunday night. But as she left by an earlier train, she came before the appointed hour; and as no one was there to meet her, she went to the hotel, but the person she inquired for was not at home. She then returned to the railway to wait for her husband. At the time fixed, TRAUPMANN appeared and put the whole party into a cab, to go and lodge at Pantin and sup. The spot where the crime was to take place had been selected beforehand. Moreover, the elder KINCK and TRAUPMANN had arranged that the latter should conduct the mother alone to the place. Then follows an account of the mother's arrival with the two children, and KINCK'S examination of his wife's papers. The narrative then proceeds: "At the same moment that he plunged his knife into the back of one of the children, and then, with the rapidity of lightning, struck at his wife, a long struggle ensued between them, and the shrieks of agony were heard without the assistance which he afforded KINCK the latter would have been mastered and perhaps killed by the woman. TRAUPMANN refused to go for the other children, so that the son went; this latter first strangled his brother with a silk handkerchief lest from the presence and which was a yellow one with flowers cast similar to that in which he had his weapon tied up when he was arrested. TRAUPMANN asserts that he remained until 5 o'clock near the scene of the crime, which was committed at 11, minutes before arriving at the place fixed for a subsequent meeting, he had lost his way, and walked about for two or three miles in a wrong direction. He returned to his hotel about 6 in the morning. He saw the younger KINCK, who told him that the father had remained on the watch to know when the crime was discovered. At 11 the same evening he had left him there the murder had been discovered. The younger ment at first was that all three should go away together, but under the circumstances they decided to separate. They met at the Café Parisien and TRAUPMANN received the papers and diamonds found in his possession, and about ten francs. The wound on his head and the scratches he received in snatching from the hand of Mme. KINCK the knife which she had wrested from her husband. KINCK, after having literally hacked his wife and children to pieces with his knife, completed his work with a pickax. Then the prisoner started for Havre, whence he intended to escape to America. He does not know where has become of the KINCKS, but thinks that they are still in Paris. He would like to see them arrested, as they would relieve him from a great part of the responsibility attached to the crime. He professes to have been ignorant of what was about to ensue when he conducted the wife. He professes the sincerest repentance and sobs bitterly. One thought seems especially to beset him—not the fear of the scaffold, which he has merited—but the remembrance of his old mother, whom his dishonor will kill, he says. He seems to make his avowal in good faith. TRAUPMANN states that on arriving at Havre he went first to the Hotel du Perigord, where he gave the name of Jean Kinck; then he passed the second night at the Hotel de New-York, where he called himself WOLFF. As the night preceding his arrest he says he passed it out of doors, on the jetty; he took his food at various wineshops which he cannot point out.

FACING THE DEAD.

The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Star, writing Sept. 24, gives interesting particulars concerning the prisoner's arrival in Paris. Last night, says he, I happened to dine at the house of one of the Détective Agents commissioned by Government to perform the sad duty of the murdered family. My host had been summoned at 9 o'clock to meet the Procureur-Imperial, the Juge d'Instruction, and other functionaries, who, they thought, would be required to confront TRAUPMANN at the Morgue, to confront him with his victims, as is the custom of this country in cases of murder, and submit him to a preliminary examination. The following details are therefore received from an eye-witness of the singular scene connected with the visit to the Morgue. The prisoner had been removed on Friday afternoon from the hospital at Havre, whither he was taken to recover him from the effects of his attempted drowning, to the city jail. The news of his arrival in Paris, and of his endeavors to bring him up to Paris, spread through Havre at an early hour. A dense crowd had collected outside the prison gates as early as 10 in the morning. The entrance of M. CLAUDE, the Chief Commissary of Police, attended by his Secretary, creating within the court-yard immense excitement. At 9 o'clock the prisoner was informed of his intended removal. He refused all food, and appeared in a state of intense excitement. M. CLAUDE, prepared for the danger of allowing TRAUPMANN to be seized by the infuriated mob, ordered a cab to the back gate of the prison, and thus hoped to get him away quietly. But the crowd, on finding that the prisoner did not leave by the ordinary gates, guessed what had taken place, and therefore made a rush to the railway terminus. Shouts of "A short Resistance" were heard on all sides, and even M. CLAUDE and his companions, whose only object was to protect the prisoner, were some moments in actual danger. During the journey he remained sunk in the further corner of the railway carriage, and constantly held an India handkerchief over his face so as to conceal his features. He refused all food of food which M. CLAUDE had provided for him in the carriage. At Rouen the travelers by the same train endeavored to force open the doors of the reserved compartment, and to break the Venetian blinds which were lowered. This repeated hostility occasioned a delay of a quarter of an hour in the arrival of the train. Police in plain clothes were posted in the vicinity of the St. Lazare terminus at Paris, every precaution being necessary to guard against the rage and curiosity of the people. A considerable crowd, having gathered in the Place du Havre, M. CLAUDE decided on taking his prisoner out of the terminus by the Porte des Morts, which is only used when coffins arrive from the country for interment near Paris, opposite which two carriages were in waiting, and conveyed the cortège at a rapid pace to the Morgue. TRAUPMANN is a man of small stature. His eye is keen, his teeth remarkable for their beauty, his features well formed, his forehead by no means peculiar, as has been said, his figure ill-made, and his gait slouching. On his arrival at the Morgue he appeared to weep, but the sincerity of his grief was much doubted by my host. He, however, evidently wished to impress his interrogators with his emotion. When brought in to the Salle des Morts, the Procureur-Imperial, in an authoritative manner, pointing to the body of Mme. KINCK, asked him whose corpse it was. TRAUPMANN, looking steadily at the dead, replied, "C'est Mme. KINCK." He was led past each body successively, and, to the question of identity, he in a clear voice gave the name of the child. A slight nervous twitch was observable as he stood opposite the body of the little MARIE. TRAUPMANN was then led into the adjoining room and examined by the Procureur-Imperial. To every question he unhesitatingly gave a reply—the substance being that it was true that he was present during the assassinations; that he saw the family murdered; that it had been he who had latched the mother and younger children first from the carriage and brought them, as he asserts, to Kinck; that he held the mother, who made an heroic resistance, while she was being butchered. He had no motive for assisting in the murders. The little children were only killed because, as they insisted on accompanying their mother, it was necessary to get rid of their testimony; and the three remaining boys were killed because no one knew how otherwise to dispose of them. TRAUPMANN spoke with a strong Alsatian accent. The impression made on my friend by his manner was that he experienced no true emotion, and that he was a man of indomitable energy of character, and perfectly capable—having once decided on a line of defence—of keeping to it. My host being sworn to secrecy on all important items of what may have transpired during the examination, necessarily could make no revelation. I can, but from your private impression, which is that he did not himself attach credit to any of TRAUPMANN'S assertions. The family are now, having been confronted with one of the murderers and recognized by him, to be buried at St. Mandrier. The Figaro has started an idea which increasingly gains credence with the populace, that TRAUPMANN, and probably other associates, first murdered KINCK père and then the son. It appears an ascertained fact that TRAUPMANN bore a bad character previous to his having gone to Roubaix in search of employment. He has not as yet accounted for the two watches—one gold and the other silver—discovered in his possession, and already identified by a Roubaix watchmaker as having been sold, in 1868, to JEAN KINCK, the father; and when asked how he came by the KINCK family papers, he said that JEAN KINCK intrusted them to him.

ANOTHER CORPSE UNEARTHED.

The Paris of Sept. 28 published the following startling intelligence: "An immense crowd assembled at Pantin to-day. Some of the visitors discovered, at about twenty-five yards from the spot where the first six bodies were found, a seventh, which is supposed to be that of the younger KINCK. A person who saw the body tells us that in the throat a dagger was still fixed. The Commissary of Police and the gendarmes were immediately informed of the discovery, and went to the spot." The above was confirmed by the National, which said: "At the moment of going to press we learn a piece of news which we give under every reserve. The dead body of GUSTAVE KINCK has been found, we learn, interred within a few metres from the trench which contained the other six murdered persons, and having a pointed knife sticking in its throat. The instrument which a tiler uses for cutting slates was lighted on at the same time." Finally, the Pays spoke still more positively, as it said: "A seventh corpse was discovered this afternoon at a few metres' distance from the trench in which the bodies had been hidden. M. DROUET-D'ARCQ, the examining Magistrate, and the Secret Police have entered on an investigation. Everything leads to the belief, to judge from the clothes and age, that the eldest son, GUSTAVE KINCK, has been here discovered. The body has a large wound at the back of the head, so that all hypothesis of suicide must be set aside. The point on which the judicial examination now turns is to ascertain whether GUSTAVE KINCK aided in the massacre of the others, and was afterward murdered himself, or whether he preceded the rest of the family to the grave." The exciting intelligence so given is corroborated by Galignani's information of Sept. 27. The discovery of the third body took place in this manner: A carman, named Huettes, living at No. 39 Route d'Aubervilliers, at Pantin, while walking about the field like the rest of the persons attracted by motives of curiosity, suddenly felt a fold of earth sink beneath his foot. He thoroughly as he afterward described his impressions, that he could hear a sort of subterranean echo, which answered to the noise of his footsteps. With out being versed in physics, as he modestly remarked to the Commissary of Police, he imagined he was walking over a ballon which ought not to be there. Being resolved to see if his supposition was correct, he knelt down and commenced removing the earth with his fingers. He presently came on part of a coat skirt, and then on a corpse lying with its face downward, the arms extended and the fingers contracted, to the right hand was still attached a tuft of black hair. The authorities were immediately informed of this discovery, and M. ROUSSEL, Commissary of Police at Pantin, proceeded to the spot with M. ALIPONE, his secretary, and M. LEGAGNE, the medical man. They had been called to examine the bodies on the previous Monday. Before these gentlemen had arrived, a mass, in moving a clod of earth with his foot, found some dark brown hair, which the people shared between them. The news got circulated with wonderful rapidity, and in a few minutes probably 20,000 persons were collected on the spot. A detachment of infantry, of about 120 men, from the fort of Aubervilliers, came forward and formed around this new grave a wide circle, in the midst of which the authorities continued the search. This barrier being hardly sufficient to keep back the crowd, was strengthened by four gendarmes on horseback. A man with a spade volunteered his aid, and then was witnessed a scene of excitement impossible to describe. The immense crowd stood breathless with expectation. The group in the interior of the circle consisted only of the Commissary, his secretary, M. OZENNE DE BREVILLE, Deputy Substitute to M. DROUET D'ARCQ, Examining Judge, the carman HUGUES, his laborer with his spade, and the doctor. The body was soon completely uncovered and placed on its back; in the neck was seen a fearful wound, large enough to insert the two first hands, and which had almost detached the head from the body and positively laid open the vertebral column. A common black-handled knife was still sticking in the place. M. LEGAGNE stooped and with his hands removed from the face the earth and clotted blood which had adhered to it; the upper lip bore the traces of a mustache, and the chin had never been shaved. The flesh, however, peeled off, and the hair dropped away from the head on being touched; the doctor was consequently obliged to suspend the examination, but not before he had remarked that the corpse, which was horribly disfigured, bore traces of a struggle; three deep wounds were found in the region of the heart, and at the back of the head a deep hole, no doubt produced by a blow from a pickax. A sheet was thrown over the body, and a passenger gardener's cart, at the bottom of which straw had been laid, was brought to the spot. On the removal of the body the doctor remarked the size of the feet, which were no doubt intended for very capacious and enormous shoes. He had read in some journal that GUSTAVE KINCK had these extremities unusually large. M. LOGAGNE then examined the body more closely; it was that of a young man of about 18, wearing trousers of a yellowish color with a black stripe; a waistcoat of the same kind, a coat of dark brown fancy stuff, with a side pocket, all exactly corresponding to the description of the elder son. The cap of brown and violet check was searched for and found in the hole. There could no longer be any doubt that this was the body of GUSTAVE KINCK. If any uncertainty had remained it would have been removed on seeing the light blue knitted vest and the ribbed stockings, like those worn by the other children. At 3 in the cart set out for the Morgue, passing through Pantin, escorted by a piquet of infantry, and accompanied by the Commissary of Police, M. ROUSSEL. On hearing Paris the soldiers returned to their quarters leaving the melancholy cortège reduced to the persons strictly necessary. The spot where this body was found is situated about midway between the larger grave and the Chemin-Vert. It is six feet long, twenty feet in width and six of little depth. This seventh corpse had evidently been found when the population brought stakes with which they formed a railing around the spot; they also fixed in the earth a cross, with an image of the Virgin and a wreath of immortelles. Flowers were also thrown into the inclosure by the hysterical. The sentiments of pity were mingled with ideas of vengeance against the tyrant law exist in France, TRAUPMANN would have been torn to pieces, if the people could only lay hands on him. The crowd seemed persuaded that an eighth body, that of JEAN KINCK, must also be buried in the field, which the people already call "The Traupmann cemetery." A laborer, having scratched the earth at a short distance from the second grave, pickaxes were produced and several men commenced turning up the ground, but without result; the dog went further on and commenced howling, howling, again and again, the workers following him, until five excavations had been made. No new discovery was made, and darkness at length forced the searchers to abandon their task. At 11 o'clock, however, a small fire-shovel and a pickax, which had no doubt been used in the murders, were found covered with earth in a furrow between the two graves. These implements are not the same as those purchased of M. BELLANGER, the ironmonger in the Rue de Flandre.

MR. PEABODY.

The Philanthropist to the Members of the Committee on the Peabody Statue.

The following letter of acknowledgment has been addressed by Mr. PEABODY to the members of the committee who communicated to him the recent inauguration of the statue erected in his honor near the Royal Exchange:

To Sir Benjamin R. Phillips and others:

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge your communication of the 28th of July, announcing the inauguration of Mrs. STORY'S statue of me near the Royal Exchange by the Prince of WALES; and I have to express to you, individually and collectively, my warmest and kindest thanks for the deep interest you have manifested in the undertaking from its very inception, and my gratification at learning that the assiduous attention which you have devoted to it has been so perfectly crowned with success. The international character which was given to the ceremonies has been especially gratifying to me, as everything has ever been which could tend to connect more closely the two great nations of England and the United States—both of them very dear to me, and never more so than at the present time. I feel under the deepest obligations to the Prince of WALES for the cordiality with which he accepted your invitation, and for the graceful manner and kind expressions with which he accompanied the ceremonies of unveiling the statue; and it has given me great pleasure to learn that on that occasion my friend, Mr. MOTLEY, the American Minister, addressed, as I believe for the first time in public, an English audience. And it has been a source of great satisfaction to me that an eminent American sculptor should have so well performed the task you gave him, and that your choice has been sustained by the verdict of the London public, who have manifested so kind an interest and approval in the result. I notice with much gratification, among the list of subscribers, that a large number of the working men of London aided the undertaking by their subscriptions. I can but hope that the course of my life, now drawing toward its close, may justify, when finished, all the honors which have been so freely bestowed on me, of which this is one of the greatest; and I cannot more strongly express my feelings than to say that I do not believe there could be found in the whole Kingdom a man of any rank, however high, who would not feel honored by such a noble testimonial as you have just dedicated to a humble American citizen.

With great respect, your friend and humble servant, GEORGE PEABODY.

WASHINGTON.

Compensation of Government Employes—A Test Case in Court—A Torpedo Found in Government Coal—The Large Habeas Corpus.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9.—An application was made in the District Supreme Court to-day for a mandamus compelling the Secretary of the Treasury and the First Comptroller to show cause why a certain employe of the Government should not receive the exact twenty per cent. compensation under the act of 1867. It appears that while the law covers all the civil employes of the Government, the custom has been to allow the compensation to the clerks only. The present suit is brought by a man who was employed outside of the departments, and will be made a test case.

INTERNAL REVENUE RECEIPTS.

The Internal Revenue receipts to-day, which amounted to $600,075 20, were made up of the following items—from collectors, $422,600 80; stamps, $60,438 90; passports, $4,035. The total amount of revenue received since June 30 is $63,692,775 90.

A CURIOUS CIRCUMSTANCE.

A small torpedo was discovered to-day in a lot of coal delivered to the Howard University. It had a small charge of powder in it, and is supposed to have come from the mining regions. There are various surmises about it, but no one supposes that it was intended to blow up the University.

THE LARGER HABEAS CORPUS.

The Supreme Court will, on Monday next, fix a day for the argument in the Yerger case, on petitions for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari.

PERSONAL.

Among the arrivals in town to-day was Mr. ADAM BADEAU, of the London Legation. He has returned home on leave of absence for the purpose of examining papers left by the late Secretary RAWLINS, to gain further information which will be of value to him in completing his second volume of the life of President GRANT.

Major-General GEO. H. THOMAS left to-night for New-York.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

THE WILL OF THE LATE GENERAL RAWLINS.

GEO. M. ROBESON, Secretary of the Navy, accompanied by President GRANT, appeared in the Orphans' Court with the will of the late General JOHN A. RAWLINS, for the purpose of qualifying as executors under the will. General JESSE E. SMITH, Colonel EZE PARKER and Hon. JACOB D. COX, who witnessed the execution of the will, testified to the genuineness of the signature of the deceased, and the will was admitted to probate and record. Letters testamentary were issued to Mrs. RAWLINS and President GRANT; the amount of the bond for the faithful execution of their trust being fixed at $20,000. He first bequeathed to his wife and children his house and lot situated at the southwest corner of Twelfth and M streets, as usual mine, as also his lands in Cheyenne and Golden City, Wyoming Territory; to his son JAMES BRANDON RAWLINS he leaves his library; to his father and mother his property known as Rawlins' Homestead, in the town of Guilford, Jo Davis County, Ill. At their death the property is to be divided into eight portions, five of them to go to his brother LEMUEL, who is to satisfy his sisters, MARY and LAURA, and brother ROBERT, and keep the place as a whole.

POSTMASTERS APPOINTED.

The President, to-day, appointed GEO. C. CORBATH as postmaster at Dover, N. H., and SETH HODGES as Postmaster at Danville, N. Y.

Secretary BOUTWELL left Washington this morning for Philadelphia. He expects to return to-morrow.

HON. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL.

His Speech in Philadelphia—Financial Policy of the Administration—The Public Debt to be Paid in Full in Coin or Its Equivalent—A Lower Rate of Interest Desirable.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 9.—Secretary BOUTWELL arrived in this city to-day as the guest of the Union League. To-night he addressed an immense assemblage at Horticultural Hall. Upon being introduced he disclaimed being actuated by any partisan purpose in addressing his hearers, though appreciating the importance of the coming election. In this contest, among other considerations, were these: First, whether the present Administration, which had succeeded two Administrations of like political policy, should now be indorsed and justified by the voice of a great people. Secondly, whether the Chief Magistrate of this Republic, who, in the pressure of a great national exigency, had been called from comparative retirement to the command of an army of a million of men, whom he guided to a successful issue, should now, in the restoration of the Government, be indorsed and justified. But that particular consideration which had impelled him to address his hearers was to be found in the query, whether, after having made the Declaration of Independence a living fact, and everywhere organized justice into law, the people of this country would so identify themselves with the policy of the President and his Administration as to render it certain that the obligations, pecuniary and otherwise, which had been incurred in the struggle for national existence, should be faithfully kept? It was not so much a question whether the public creditors should be paid, as it was whether 40,000,000 of people had the conscience and sentiment to do right, even though it be at their own peril. He was aware of the differences of opinion as to the payment of the public debt exactly in the manner contemplated by the Administration. He therefore would state in a single sentence the Administration's entire policy with regard to the public debt as he comprehended it: It was that the debt was to be paid, principal and interest, according to the terms of the contract, in coin, or that which men will receive as an equivalent of coin without any abatement whatever. [Great Applause.] This was the proper course, not because it was to the interest of those who had taken the nation's promises to pay, but because the people would prove themselves unworthy the character of American citizens, did they hesitate to do what they had promised to do. There were those who went into an inquiry as to whether the public creditors received dollar for dollar equal to the amount of our obligations; others inquired whether the interest already paid was not sufficient to satisfy the public obligation and justify us in compelling the bondholders to release our evidence of obligations; and others who proposed to pay the principal and deny the interest. All these were insane and delusions. There was but one proper course of procedure, and that was the course which the honest merchant pursued to meet our obligations manfully and to fulfil them to the last cent. [Long continued applause.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

MY BREECH CLUMP.

Soft sunshine floods a peaceful world,
And flames above the wold;
The forest-sprays gleam half-uncurled,
Tipped each with lambent gold.

But most the grand old beeches take
A fuller, warmer glow,
Whereat old memories awake,
Sweet fancies bud and blow.

How oft, in many a bygone May,
For men long dead, their sheen
Brightened the dusky woodland way
With curving breadths of green!

And shook, 'twixt many a Summer sun,
In graceful checkered shades—
The ringdove's haunt, the squirrel's run,
When Autumn strewed the glades.

Their knotted roots type earnest will,
That hold its purpose fast;
Their monstrous arms may bend, but still
Regain their place at last.

Each bough for me—each dancing spray—
With happy dreams is bright;
I love their murmurs through the day,
Their rustling through the night.

A boy, I clomb each mighty head,
And 'neath their sylvan roofs
Tints from their golden Autumn shed,
O'er youth's fond visions woofs.

Ye cherished trees! may many a swain
Beneath you tell his grief,
And in your magic find his pain
From Nature wins relief.

No ax shall cut, no knife shall lop
Or hole or spreading arm;
Spare, winds, each venerable top!
Here, tempests, breathe no harm!

Endeared to home and homely life,
Ye share my hope, my fear;
Wave gently, when I quit earth's strife,
Above your poet's bier!

And murmur mournful dirges low,
And shiver in the breeze;
And as new Summers come and go,
New generations please;

And influence every thoughtful mind,
And move each kindly breast
In Nature and her joys to find
Contentment, patience, rest!

BETSY'S BEAU.

From Chambers' Journal.

"It is a thing that I never did allow, and that I never will allow," said my wife, making up for her small person and mumpoising aspect by speaking very loudly, and as if she had had large experience in servants—lessons duly instilled by a lady, a near relative, who kindly supervises our domestic affairs, and pays us long visits. "If it had been a relative, or I had been asked, I might not have objected; but I must beg that nothing of the kind ever occur again," said my wife in continuation of her lecture.

"But, please, 'm, he didn't have nothink to eat," said our one handmaiden deprecatingly, but with somewhat of an injured tone.

"I was not allinding to that, Elisabeth," said Mrs. Scribe, severely, "but to the principle. I do not go so far as to say I will not allow followers; but if anything similar to last night's affair takes place I shall consider that you have forfeited your situation. Now, clear away the breakfast things."

"Anything similar to last night's affair!" I said, repeating my wife's words, as soon as Elisabeth had indignantly swept the table, and then herself out of the room. "I suppose 'anything similar' means another lifeguard or a grenadier."

"Now, don't be absurd, dear," was the reply. "Of course, we cannot allow such goings on."

"We" said I.

"Well, there then, I cannot allow such goings on; and I'm sure you do not wish me to go down into my own kitchen of a night, to be startled by great scarlet men."

"You never evinced any fear of the great scarlet lady, my dear," I ventured to observe, and making what I thought a very pungent allusion to sundry leanings toward vestments, candles, incense and flowers as displayed at a neighboring church.

"How witty" was the caustic rejoinder; "when I took refuge in the morning paper, and afterward beat a retreat city-ward."

By way of peace-offering, I came back that evening bearing "the neatest thing" I could purchase in the shape of umbrellas; but it was not warmly received.

"Elisabeth has given warning this afternoon," said my wife.

"Tit for tat," I replied; "for I'm sure you gave her warnings enough this morning."

"And now I think the best thing to be done is to let her go; for the silly thing is quite infatuated with the great tall booby I found in the kitchen last night, and has done nothing but sob and cry, and go on, ever since."

"I trust that there are no briny pearls in this soup?" I said.

"Of course not," was the reply. "I made it myself."

"How weak are women," I remarked after a pause; "and yet how hard upon each other's failings. 'None but the brave deserve the fair,' says the proverb; and the fair think, in consequence, that they have the only right to the brave."

"The brave! Such stuff! Why, I believe, George, if you had your way, you would encourage the girl in her mad fit. A soldier, indeed, without a penny to help himself, let alone to keep a wife!"

"But the manly beauty—the uniform!" I suggested.

"Manly nonsense!"

"And besides, it does not seem fair that the whole of the military force should be monopolized by the nursemaids, leaving only Policeman X for the cooks, and"——

"There!" exclaimed my wife; "look at that! Did you ever see such audacity!"

"Turning immediately, I could not refrain from a smile, for plainly shewn upon the window blind by the street lamp was the shadow of a huge life-guardsman, his well padded chest, fierce moustache, and elegantly balanced foraging cap being displayed to great advantage.

"That's the same man!" exclaimed my wife; "and now, if you watch, you will see him pass the window and go down the area."

"The soles are getting cold, my love," I said; "and I should infinitely prefer a position, to turning myself into a vedette to watch the movements of the enemy. Now, if your respected mamma had happened to be here!"

"Now, don't be nonsensical. I'm sure mamma never suggested anything that was not for your good, George."

"Perhaps not, my love," I said; "but it is not always agreeable to take physic, however beneficial it may prove. Thanks! Now I'll trouble you for the anchovy. No potatoes thank you. Shall I ring for the other things? Slow-moving Betsy will not have them up before we have done with the fish."

"If you please," was the very polite reply, and turning my head, I found that the shadow picture upon the blind had disappeared.

"Of course it has," said my wife, who had divined my thoughts. "And she is now down in the kitchen, feasting upon the tit-bits supplied to him by that disgraceful creature."

"Let's ring and startle them, then," said I, and leaving my chair, I gave a lusty peal at the bell.

In the course of a minute or two up came Elisabeth, very smart, and very ruddy of cheek—due, no doubt, to the cooking—and began to change the dishes.

"Did I not hear some one down stairs, Elisabeth?" said my diplomatic wife.

"Down stairs, mum? No, mum; not since the milk came."

"Oh, that was at four o'clock," said my wife; "I mean just now."

"No, mum, not as I've heard: the bell hasn't been touched for a good hour."

"Oh!" said my wife, and then all was silent, while the soup and fish were removed, and the partridges Smith sent us were placed upon the table, when the maid disappeared.

"Pity she admires, or rather has her destiny ruled by Mars, for she is a capital cook," I said, going on with the carving. "Dare say she reads Zadkiel."

"Of course she does," said my wife; "and Bow Bells, and the London Journal, and Family Herald, and all sorts of stuff."

"And The Moonstone, and Birds of Prey, I suppose, too," I observed; "but perhaps she does not favor Madie."

"If you wish to send me up to my bedroom in tears, George, pray say so. I'm sure I don't know what I have done that"—sob—"that"—sob, pocket handkerchief, and one tear right in the bread sauce.

But the next moment, plainly heard, there was the buzz, buzz of a manly voice, a giggle, a squeak, and the scraping of a chair—all plainly heard to proceed from the kitchen—coming up, as it were, through the floor; for the houses in New Park Crescent are very slightly built, so slightly, indeed, that we have never started a piano of our own, in consequence of the abundance of musical sounds proceeding from room 5 and 6, right and left of us.

"A deceitful creature!" exclaimed my wife, no longer tearful; "and did she not declare to my face, ten minutes ago, that there was no one down stairs?—Ring the bell, George."

"Not till I've finished my dinner in peace, my love," I said firmly, "even if there were the whole of the Turkish Contingent down stairs. After dinner, I'm at your service, but if I am to engage Shaw, the life-guardsman, I must have another glass or two of sherry first. Who the deuce can that be?" I exclaimed, for a cab stopped at the gate, and there was a loud ring at the front bell.

Then came the soft patter of poor Elisabeth's feet, the opening of the front door, a short sharp altercation, as if a cabman were dissatisfied with his fare, and then my wife started from her chair exclaiming: "Why, it's mamma!"

"The devil!"——

"George!" exclaimed my wife; and the next moment the door opened; there was scuttling, and I had to leave the choicest brownest tit-bit of partridge on my plate, to be kissed and called "my dear boy!"

"No," she would not have the soup up—mamma would not. She was so sorry, but the train was late, or she would have been with us in time to sit down to dinner. There was a sole left, was there? Then she would have that; it could not be so very cold.

"Bring the fish back, Elisabeth," said my wife; and it was evident that for the present Mars was completely out of her memory.

A few minutes elapsed, during which "dear mamma" had a glass of sherry, and then Elisabeth came back holding in her hand the head of a sole; the one, I was ready to swear, I had left on my plate, for I knew it by its scooped-out eye.

"Oh, m, if you please, 'm!" explained Elisabeth.

"Well, Elisabeth?" said my wife.

"That there cat, 'm, while I was up answering the door. There was nothing left but this here head, mum, as I was just in time to see it jump off the table on to the floor."

"You careless creature!" cried my wife, "to leave it like that. There, bring a hot plate. Have a little partridge, mamma, dear?"

Directly after, I saw some one's face change, and a very suspicious look was directed at the handmaid, but that young lady evidently saw nothing; and the meal passed off in a most satisfactory way—that is to say, as far appearances went—for I knew I did not have anything like my share of the birds.

At last I was left alone to have my one glass or two of claret, and the ladies seconded, as I supposed, to the drawing room; while under the idea that the new arrival would render her secure from interruption, the fair Elisabeth descended to the nether regions.

Now, I wonder whether that gentleman is below stairs? I thought; and then, somehow my ideas were shunted off on to another line, and went off at express rate, till I was roused by hearing the front door open.

"Who in the world is that going out?" I thought, and then I listened for the closing, but in vain; while directly after a strange, ghostly shadow passed the window, which shade I made out to be that of my respected mother-in-law, with a mantle over her head.

"Why, she's going down into the kitchen," I muttered; and leaving my seat, I opened the door just in time to catch my wife in the passage.

"Oh, I see!" I exclaimed softly; "going to attack the enemy front and rear. Elaborate tactics, I must say!"

"You need not trouble yourself, Sir, unless you please," was the reply. "I daresay mamma and I can discomfit the enemy, as you call him, without your help."

"But are you sure there is any one below?" I said.

"O dear no, Sir! only that there is a cat there with a strong love for fried soles!"

"There, come along!" I said, for there was no help for it; and if there is anything I dislike, it is meddling with the servants and their belongings.

But we had not half descended the kitchen stairs, before we heard loud voices in altercation.

"That I'm sure there ain't, mum, if it's the last words I had to utter, mum, there aint; and if missus was here"——

"Your mistress is here, Elisabeth!" said my wife, now entering the kitchen, with the writer following, feeling very small, and taking in the coup d'œil of Mrs. Scribe's mamma standing at the area door, and Betsy keeping guard over that leading into the back kitchen.

"Take the candle and look in the coal cellar, George," said my mother-in-law. "I'm certain I heard some man's voice down stairs."

"It must have been next door, Sir," said Betsy, appealing to me.

"Walls are thin?" I suggested, feeling disposed to draw off the forces, and to give the unfortunate enemy, if one there were, an opportunity to retreat.

"Strue as goodness, mum, there's no one here," said Betsy.

"Oh, you bad abandoned hussy!" exclaimed Mrs. Scribe's mamma, shaking her head at the maiden. "Why don't you look in the coal cellar, George?"

I felt disposed to swear at the coal cellar; but Mrs. Scribe just then whispering "Must I go?" I went, to make the pleasant discovery that there was not above a sack left of the last two tons; but Mars was not there, neither was he in the dust bin; and coming back out of the area, I found our dear mamma peering in the kitchen cupboard, and apparently about next to open the drawers of the dresser.

All this time poor Betsy, with the palest of pale faces, was keeping guard over the back kitchen door, which my wife now approached.

"Which, surely, mum, you're not going to demean yourself by going in that dirty place, mum?" said the girl.

"Dirty, indeed, I've no doubt," said Mrs. Scribe's mamma.

"There; why not take the girl's word?" said I, wishing, with my customary pusillanimity, to make a compromise. "Is there any one a soldier in that back kitchen, Elisabeth?"

But instead of answering, the girl buried her face in her apron, and began to sob bitterly, when, leading her aside, the visitor opened the door, and mentioned to me to go first.

What could I do but obey? So, taking up the candle I had the moment before set down, I stepped boldly in, feeling sure that the murder must now be out. But no; the one large cupboard stood wide open, and there was no one behind the door; the place was perfectly empty.

"Look under the table, George!" exclaimed Mrs. Scribe's mamma.

"Don't talk nonsense!" I exclaimed. "Why, a cat could not hide itself under that table. Now, I hope you are satisfied;" and hanging down the candlestick, I strode back to our little dining room, soon after hearing the ladies go up stairs.

Poor Betsy looked very pale and troubled when she came to announce tea; but I was not surprised, and spoke kindly to the girl, believing that this time she had been unjustly accused; and then went and partook of my comfortless cup.

The tea was removed, and an hour passed, and then Mrs. Scribe's mamma, fatigued with her journey from Hastings, retired to her bedroom—what in most homes would have been the back drawing room—while I descended to my little den behind the dining room, to try to finish an article commenced that morning. Mrs. Scribe following shortly to sit by my fire and "talk" to me, that being her custom when I was disposed to work afterwards.

We were both in very severe moods, she upon her low hardee stool, I at my table; and for a time nothing was heard but the clicking of Mrs. Scribe's tatting shuttle, and the scratching of my pen.

But there was no article finishing that night with so many clouds in the horizon; for, raising my eyes, I could see a couple of tears stealing down on either side of the prettiest little nose in the world; my pen dropped; the tatting fell all of a horrible tangle; and then some one was on her knees at my feet, and I was just going to press my lips on the white forehead within their reach, when there was a noise!

Yes; there was a noise—a strange, hair-stirring noise, apparently at our shoulders; and then the sound of footsteps on the stairs, in the passage, and then a loud flop, as of some one falling on the oil-cloth, followed by hysterical sobs and cries.

We leaped up and opened the door, to find poor Betsy apparently in a fit—now sobbing, now crying, now shrieking, and pouring forth "Obs!" innumerable, but quite incapable of answering questions.

Then came the ringing of Mrs. Scribe's mamma's bell, and, as it was of course not answered, the opening of her door, and her voice descending to know what all the groaning was, that she could hear.

And now, not only from Betsy, but as from the wall, came, great and strong, loud heart-rending, half-stifled groans, similar to those I had first attributed to Betsy, and which I had laid the credit of Betsy.

"Oh, exclaimed dear mamma, "it is some poor creature dying next door, and the cries have frightened this poor girl. Run, George, and see if you can be of any avail."

Then came more groans, and several distinct knocks at the wall.

"There, there; pray go, dear," said my wife; "some one must be in great pain."

Directly after there was a loud peal at the front door bell, and on going I found my neighbor Jones evidently come for help.

"What is the matter?"

"What is the matter?"

Both in a breath.

"Some one must be dying at your house," said Jones.

"No, no; at your house," I said.

"But we can hear the groans in our library."

"So can we in ours!" I exclaimed. "Come here." And leading the way into the back room, there we could hear the stifled groans again.

"It's in your house," I said.

"No, no; it's in the chimney," exclaimed Mr. Jones. "Good Heavens! there'll be some one smothered!"

"Yes, yes, yes; chimney, chimney," shrieked Elisabeth; and then she went off again into strong, genuine hysterics.

"Is anyone there?" I cried, going close to the wall.

"Oh-h-h!" came back a these groans in reply; and now a light burst upon my brain.

"Here, Jones—this way," I cried; and snatching up the little lamp, I was going down stairs, when the shrieking of the ladies in protest at being left in the dark arrested me.

"Want a light?" said a gruff voice, and starting, I looked round to encounter a policeman, who, attracted by Betsy's screams, had come in by the open door.

"Here—this way, my man," I cried; "there is some one stuck in the chimney."

"In the what?" he exclaimed, incredulously.

"Oh-h-h!" came from the wall again.

"It's t'other side; that's what it is," said the policeman.

"It isn't, I tell you," cried Jones. "There, man; listen."

"Oh-h-h!" came now, and a strange rustling noise as of some one struggling.

"I'm blest if there ain't!" exclaimed the constable.

"Here—this way; I know," I said; and leading the way, we soon stood in the back kitchen, where, by the help of the policeman's bull's eye, I could just make out a pair of boot soles up the chimney, and something glistening, which I made out to be spurs.

We shouted up the chimney; but no answer came, and there was only an occasional kicking of the boots—feeble kicking, as if their occupier was in a sore strait.

"Let's get up stairs again," said the policeman. "He's stuck tight, that's what he is;" and, obedient to the voice of law, we followed to the back room, where, after tapping at the wall two or three times, and eliciting a faint groan that sounded something like "Help!" the constable started off—rather leisurely, I thought—but soon returned with a crowbar and hammer-armed bricklayer, and another policeman.

There was no stopping to tear up our Brussels carpet, for, attacking the wall, bricks, mortar, plaster and torn paper soon formed a dusty heap; and after guiding himself by listening once or twice, in an incredibly short space of time there was a hole made through into the chimney communicating with the back kitchen, and through that hole came a faint sigh.

"Come; hold up, old chap, whoever you are," said one of the policemen; and then to me: "Got a drop of brandy, Sir?"

I soon fetched the spirit, and then, in the sight of the horrified women, the hole was sufficiently enlarged to lay bare a ghastly, soot-blackened face, with protruding eyeballs and grinning teeth; but as there was no room to reach the man's lungs more purely, there was a change took place, aided by some brandy administered in a spoon by one of the policemen.

It was all plain enough now, and I was not much surprised, when, the hole being sufficiently enlarged, a tall, stout life-guardsman was dragged out, but only to fall upon the rubbish-heap, completely exhausted.

"Found on the premises for felonious purposes," said one policeman. "'Course, you'll press the charge, Sir?"

But I did not answer, being too much taken up with the poor fellow before me, whom it was evident a few more minutes would have stifled.

"Could'nt you get down again?" I asked him, as soon as he could speak.

"No; not an inch, Sir—nor yet up—jammed in," he gasped; "and 'cat from next chimney, too, seemed to stop my breath."

"How did you get there, eh?" queried one policeman.

"There; don't bother him," I said. "I know; and he's half dead now. Here; have some more brandy."

"Thanky, Sir," he gasped feebly, and swallowed a little, but only with great difficulty; and it was painful to see the complete prostration of the great fellow; his gay scarlet jacket reduced to a blackened, torn dilapidation; and his trim whiskers and moustache all limp and mortar-filled.

"Why didn't you knock or call for help sooner?" I said, as I knelt down by him.

"I couldn't master," he whispered. "I hadn't the heart, for the poor lass' sake; and I wouldn't have groaned, when I did, if I could have kept 'em back."

"I always was weak, but if the true man that he was stood in these, I thought, I'm no judge; suffice it, those few earnest words had quite won me to his side, and I had snapped out my course.

"You'll press the charge?" said one of the policemen again.

"No," I said firmly. "The poor fellow had no felonious intent, and he has been punished enough without what will follow for breaking barrack law."

"Absurd!" exclaimed Mrs. Scribe's mamma shrilly. "I desire, George, that you have him taken off to prison directly, or we shall all be murdered in our beds."

"The sooner you are in yours, madam, I think, the better," I said politely; "for your costume."

She stayed to hear no more, for her dressing-gown and night-cap, hitherto forgotten in her anxiety, disappeared, like magic, followed by a banging door. He staggered, then, the grinning policeman and the bricklayer, and, moved by egregious folly, as Mrs. Scribe's mamma afterward told me, I allowed the wretched man to pass the night in an easy chair, seeing him off myself as soon as it was light.

Betsy left us at the end of a week, and I must own to always supporting Mrs. Scribe in her determination to have no followers from the neighboring barracks. Whether our maid married the man of her choice, I know not; but this I do know, that a great deal of poor little Betsy's romance was partially spoiled; and if we wanted a reminder when loud talking or sounds from the next house had ceased to startle us in the late hours, when sitting together—if, I say, we wanted a reminder, there it was in faded pet over the new wall which marked the hole from which we were favored with the advant of Betsy's Beau.

P. S.—Probably owing to the shock to her nerves, Mrs. Scribe's mamma returned to Hastings the next day, and did not visit us again for six months.

BROKERS AND JOBBERS.—To the broker, business on 'Change is little more than a matter of routine, for he is only a professional go-between—a link between borrowers and lenders. All he has to do is to give the best advice he can to his clients as to the prospects of this or that stock, and to buy or sell as he is ordered at the market price. Strictly speaking, these are his only functions. To buy or sell on his own account is against the etiquette of the Stock Exchange. The fluctuations in the value of stock from day to day are, therefore, to him merely the fluctuations in the readings of a barometer. The position of the jobber is very different. To him all these fluctuations are fluctuations in an account of profit and loss. His business is speculation—speculating for a rise or fall of values; and speculation of this kind in a market where competition is as keen as it is on the Stock Exchange, is a game partly of skill and partly of hazard, one requiring on the part of the player skill, wit, courage, and capital, a keen appreciation of the personal characters of the five or six statesmen and soldiers who just now hold the destinies of Europe in their hands, with an intelligent comprehension of their policy and its motives, and its prospects of success. To these men every line in REUTER'S telegrams is of personal interest; and it is their business to discount every phrase that may be uttered by the rulers of France, Prussia, Spain or Italy, to calculate its consequences on the holders of stock, and to buy on their account accordingly for a rise or fall of prices. Every morning, therefore, you will find these men reading shoots in which are chronicled the politics of the day, the prospects of war or of peace, the state of crops, the state of the Bank balances, the prospects of the harvest and the value of money; for the hour of business on the Stock Exchange is influenced by every variation of the barometer of politics and trade. Acting thus from calculation, and acting against people who in the main may be said to act merely from impulse—buying or selling upon the strength of one day's rumor, or at the whim of the moment—the jobber who has his wits about him can hardly help making himself at the end of the year with a handsome balance in his bank book.—Chambers's Journal.

LUCKY AND UNLUCKY DAYS.

Zadkiel's Almanac is a publication professing to reveal the secrets of the future. In a review of the publication for 1870, the London Daily News says: A list of lucky and unlucky days would be imperfect without a specification in detail of the misfortune which may afflict those who are ignorant of offending destiny. ZADKIEL particularizes in the most commodious manner. For example, on the 1st, 6th, 11th, 16th, 20th, 26th of January, deal with merchants, bankers or clergymen; begin new undertakings. On the 5th, 8th, 9th, 18th, 19th, 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 7th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 17th, 21st, 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th of February, deal with farmers and old folk. "Farmers and old folk?" this is a strange combination, and somewhat disrespectful to the agricultural interest. But ZADKIEL must speak the truth as he finds it, and if the Bull and Acquarius will come to cross purposes it is no fault of his. The farmers and the old folk must take care of themselves. We find that in February "Saturn will square the sun in the figure of the Imperial Prince, and as Mars is going through his ascendant let him (Mars) beware of colds, and keep his chest dry and warm; also let him avoid some rather serious hurt or accident to his leg about the time mentioned." In March VICTOR EMMANUEL (if alive) is likely to be in a bad way, and all owing to the same pernicious star. Jupiter, by moving in Taurus, seems well disposed to Ireland; but Uranus, by retrograding in cancer, "brings strange and sudden mischief on Holland, Scotland and Manchester." Those born on the 15th February will prosper in all Venus matters about the 15th of this month which gives them exactly a month and a day to improve the privileges granted by a fading custom to the votaries of St. Valentine. April promises to be lowering and dark. Mars squares Uranus, and there is turbulence on that account in England. During May, Ireland is expected to be troublesome, but Venus is kind to that country in June, while we suffer from the possession of Gemini, and are promised exciting scenes, for which the firemen are to be prepared. ZADKIEL himself will be exposed to danger on the 15th, so that we trust he will not be found far from a fire-engine. We do not pretend to discover the use of that machine for averting Saturnine influences, (as house-burning is not mentioned,) so that it may refer, for all we know, to spontaneous combustion, a proper and decorous fashion for a wizard to depart this life in. Passing on to October, we are informed, "This month will witness some remarkable squabbles among Churchmen, in which the spirit of Christian charity will play a very subordinate part." Both the Prince IMPERIAL and the Prince of WALES are exposed to perils in November. In December, what with Virgo squaring at Jupiter, Uranus retrograding in Cancer, and Saturn entering Capricorn from an unexpected quarter, a complete Irish shindy will take place in the skies, and we shall all be in danger from ill-health, grief, losses, crosses, &c.—but "from these and all other such evils," concludes ZADKIEL, "Good Lord, deliver us! and God save the Queen."

DELICATE CENSORSHIP.—The recent case of a gentleman who quarreled with the authorities of a suburban cemetery for not allowing him to record on an epitaph that his child had died from the effects of vaccination has had its counterpart in Paris, where some people have been complaining lately that there is an individual attached to every cemetery with the special purpose of amending the epitaphs according to his own views of good taste and good grammar. As people are usually very touchy in all that concerns their literary productions, one is not surprised to learn that the authors of rejected epitaphs have protested in vigorous terms against the want of appreciativeness displayed by these censors. This has induced one of the gentlemen assailed to come forward and state his experiences, which appear, from an editorial point of view, to be harrowing. He declares that out of two thousand and odd epitaphs submitted to him yearly five or six hundred are ill-spelt, or many more ungrammatical, and a hundred or so "perfectly grotesque." In the latter category he places the following, which he suffered to pass, and which, he says, sufficiently prove his indulgence:

Here lies Mdme. Adelina C——, a good wife. She would have done for her husband what the pelican does for its young.

Mdlle. Marie-Louise D——. She was an angel upon earth. What will she be in Heaven!!!! (The four points of exclamation are in the original.)

M. F. H——, aged forty, deeply regretted by his widow and his by brother, who is a Knight of the Legion of Honour.

Mme. Angélique L——, aged three years and a half. His life was one of self-denial and sacrifice.

Among the rejected are these:

Auguste C——, aged ten: "Oh! Maman! Oh! Ma'ame Jouberi!" were his last words.

M. Anatole E——, épicier: "se mort à plongé le quartier de Pepinecure dans un deuil eternel.

The censor explains, in conclusion, that he never refuses an epitaph of his own sole authority, but refers it to the Prefect of Police, who alone has power to reject decisively.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A SPOKE IN HIS WHEEL.—My putting a spoke in young Heavitree's wheel was really ludicrous—only so very unfortunate. I had not the least idea in the world, you will understand, that my Louisa liked him. I thought he was positively disagreeable to her, for I had often heard her say sharp things when he paid exaggerated compliments; and "that tiresome fellow, George," was the mildest name she had for him; so that when I heard he was coming down to wish good-by before his ship sailed, I thought the kindest thing I could do was to stick to her like wax. We were out walking I remember, by chance, taking the road he was sure to come, when he suddenly leaped over a style when we were least expecting him, having taken a short cut. I had but just time to whisper loudly to Louisa, with very round eyes, "Here's George—what a pity!" She turned very red, and the next instant he had seized both her hands, and was squeezing them violently. I looked at him as much as to say, "You mustn't do that!" but he did not mind it a bit, nor even notice, my set as then thought, "I'm not going to leave my sister to you, Master George; I shall take good care of her." So I walked on one side of her, and he on the other, and I kept looking full up in his face, whatever he said, and striking in whenever I could get in a word; and Louisa looked quite confused and ready to cry. At last George said, "There's a squirrel, Frank! Run after it." But I gave him a little nod and a knowing look, and said, "No, thank you; I don't want to; and besides, there isn't a squirrel." He muttered, "You broth of a boy!" which made Louisa laugh, and we walked for an hour or more; but meanwhile some of the others joined us, and when we got back there were visitors; and after one thing and another, George went away. Then didn't I catch it! Louisa was crosser to me than she had ever been in her life (for she wasn't cross generally) and Charlotte said to my mother, "It was too bad of Frank, mamma—he would never quit her for one moment; and I am sure George meant to propose." I was not supposed to hear this; but my mother presently called me to her, and gave me a long lecture in general terms, saying that if I continually made myself so officious and disagreeable, everybody would dislike me. I burst out with, "Why, I'm sure I thought Louisa couldn't bear him!" which mamma could hardly help laughing at; but she frowned the next moment, and said that, to impress on my mind what a disagreeable fault I had, I should learn the names of all the kings of France. So there was I floundering among Clovis and Pepin and Dagobert, not forgetting all the Charleses, Henries and Louises, which I have never thoroughly learnt to this day. But what impressed my fault (if it was one) more on my conscience than all the kings of France, was poor Louisa's long face when we went down for many a day after George Heavitree went to sea; because I love her very dearly (she was the sweetest of my sisters) and would always do anything to run my errands, and give me bits of her pocket money, if I wanted to buy a fresh lash for my whip, and give me bits of her cake when I wanted to feed the pigeons, and I would rather not have hindered her from marrying on any account, could I have helped it, poor little Louisa! Well, what's done, is done. But, when girls are fond of one thing and mamma another, and I intend to hate people and like them all the while, let them look to themselves, that's all.—From a Story by the Author of "Mary Powell," in The Quiver.

ENIGMA.

From the Will o' the Wisp.

My first is where luxury dwells,
Where beauty's proud galaxy shines—
'Tis also where justice dispels
Oppression and knavish designs.
'Tis the envied resort of the great—
'Tis the home of the veriest poor—
There, the King with his courtiers in state,
Here, misery stands at the door!

My second oft brings from afar
Of riches, a fabulous store—
Again when we're threatened with war,
'Tis the safeguard of Albion's shore;
Her sire both in forest and glade
Oft figures the noblest of trees;
She's the ally of commerce and trade,
And defies both "the storm and the breeze."

My whole I scarce think you can miss
(My meaning I've tried to make clear,)
'Tis oft the forewarner of bliss,
And often of sorrow sincere.
Be wise, nor abuse thus my whole,
But use it as though it were given
To exalt and ennoble thy soul,
And raise thee still nearer to Heaven.

DAVID WILKIE.

From the People's Magazine.

DAVID WILKIE, the great genre painter, was born on Nov. 18, 1785, at Cults, in the County of Fife. He was the third son of the minister of the village and of his third wife, the daughter of a Pittlochry miller. He found his first drawing boards, as many other artists have done, in the walls and floors of his father's house. He sketched his schoolfellows, and demanded payment in marbles, slate pencils and pounce. He had an eye for all he saw; the attitudes of workmen at labor, the rough frolics of the boys of Pittlochie, the precentor giving out the hymn at worship. Without much knowledge of drawing, he drew them all, and at last his parents surrendered their hopes of seeing DAVIE in his father's gown, and sent him to study his art in Edinburgh. Either his progress was slow or the village elders were dull, for when, in his enthusiasm, he transmitted to his mother some of his studies from the antique, they fell sorely below the Cults standard of correct anatomy. "What is this?" said one of the kirk elders, taking up the study of a foot. "It's a foot," said the proud father. "Na, na, it's mair like a fluke than a foot," was the village criticism. Now, a "fluke" is a flounder, and the elder's judgment is not flattering, if WILKIE drew correctly, to the classic extremities.

But when WILKIE returned to Cults, in 1804, and produced the humors of "The Fair of Kilbaccie," a red, raw picture, but carefully studied from the life, he earned the village honors, and, having sold it for twenty-five pounds, he fulfilled what SAMUEL JOHNSON thought the destiny of Scotchmen, and came to London, a "tall, pale, thin" lad, with the seeds of that disease which too early drained his strength, already emaciating him. For two years he studied with resolution in the schools of the Royal Academy, and then made his mark by "The Village Politicians," which was bought by Lord MANSFIELD. In the same year, 1806, he finished "The Blind Fiddler," now in the national collection. He was now twenty-one, and he writes home to his father with exultation: "My ambition is got beyond all bounds, and I have the vanity to hope that Scotland will one day be proud of DAVID WILKIE." "The Rent Day" followed in 1807, and in 1809 he was elected an Associate Member of the Royal Academy. The next year saw him a full Academician. "The Village Festival," "The Card Players," "Blind Man's Buff," and "The Cut Finger," with those already mentioned, were now exhibited by WILKIE in private premises, and failed so completely that the landlord seized the pictures for his rent. The only result of this youthful effort to get money was that it suggested to WILKIE the subject for one of his best pictures—"Distraining for Rent"—which had the rare merit of being pathetic. Our Colored Picture, "The Cut Finger," exhibits all the characteristics of WILKIE's earlier style. The humor is not too broad or too subtle. It explains itself at once, and appeals with simplicity and force to the spectator.

"Blind Man's Buff" is still more excellent; full of life and movement and rustic fun; most happily composed, and marked with WILKIE's peculiar excellence of complete harmony of the expression of the features with the attitudes assumed by the actors. One sees in these pictures and in "The Village Festival"—his most tenderly-finished subject (and WILKIE's finish was minute and exquisite)—as well as in "The Penny Wedding," the dramatic power, the innocent and festive jollity, the happy touches of nature, which made the painter the true representative in art of the new interest in the manners and feelings of country life of which BURNS was the most imaginative representative in poetry. WILKIE seems to have felt this sympathy, for he took one of BURNS' most humorous sketches of rustic nature, "Duncan Gray," and made it the subject of a pleasant picture. It is curious that, with this power of seeing and enjoying fun in human life, and of rendering it on canvas, WILKIE was quite unable to catch with any quickness the point of an epigram or the flash of wit in a play of words. A joke had to be hammered into his head by repeated blows, or to develop itself slowly by a kind of reflex action in his brain. CALLCOTT tells a happy story of this want of readiness. He had been with WILKIE at Sir JOHN SWINBURNE'S, and coming home in the cab together, CALLCOTT observed WILKIE sunk in profound thought. He made no reply to several questions; at last he broke out—"Very good, very good." "What is very good?" said CALLCOTT. It turned out that WILKIE had just then discovered the meaning of a little witty play on words which had earned in the earlier part of the evening the laughter of the company.

In 1814, he visited France, and on his return finished his "Distraining for Rent," and some years afterward "The Reading of a Will," which is now in the Pinacothek at Munich. It was a commission from the King of Bavaria, almost the sole instance of a British painter being asked to contribute to a foreign gallery.

So extended had become his reputation, that the Duke of WELLINGTON, who had now, in 1822, laid aside his helm and shield, visited him, and gave him a commission. WILKIE was describing this to HAYDON: "The Duke looked at my pictures and sketches with much attention; but was silent. At last, Lady ARGYLE began to tell me that the Duke wished me to paint him a picture, and was explaining what the subject was, when the Duke, who was at that time seated in a chair, turned up his lively eye at me, and said that the subject should be a council of old soldiers, assembled together on their seats at the door of a public house, chewing tobacco and talking over their old stories. He thought they might be in any uniform, and that it should be at some public house in the King's Road, Chelsea. I said this would make a most beautiful picture; and that it only wanted some story or principal incident to combine the figures together. He said, perhaps playing at skittles would do, or any other game. When I proposed that one might be reading a newspaper aloud to the rest? ? ? he perfectly agreed," &c.

A choice little glimpse this into the great soldier's opinion of the enjoyments of his men—chewing tobacco, skittles, chairs and a public house in Chelsea, and talking over old stories! It marks the Duke's "triumphant common sense." "Reading the Gazette of the Battle of Waterloo" had a great success, and is one of WILKIE's best pictures. Chelsea Hospital glows in the midday sun; King's Road is lined with taverns, and at every door are soldiers telling how they "won the bubble reputation even at the cannon's mouth;" and on the right, bounded by a crumbling wall, is the cemetery, where the war-drum, as it passes by, falls unnoticed on the ear of the bravest, and the bugle-call wins no response from the dead. With this picture and the "Parish Beadle," exhibited in 1822, the early style of WILKIE may be said to close. The latter picture, though the tone is too black, and the shadows, in consequence, not dark enough for harmony, is full of character and dramatic interest. It is now at the National Gallery; and bad as our beadles are said to be now-a-days, we may measure the progress of humanity and humility of that unique and interesting race by comparing them with the burly type of blustering and ignorant power, which WILKIE has drawn with all a Scotchman's hatred of parochial pomp and vanity.

In 1840 WILKIE determined on a voyage to the East. In this, and the reasons he gave for it, he initiated the modern movement of art toward a reproduction of the localities of Scripture events. An actual representation of the landscape led by a natural consequence to a realistic treatment of the events and personages of sacred history. This treatment, to the vogue of which the pre-Raphaelites, and notably HOLMAN HUNT, have contributed in our own day, is due to WILKIE's suggestion. "The time is now come," he says, "in which our supply in this walk of art must be drawn from the fountain-head." He reached Jerusalem, painting a portrait of the Sultan on the way, in February, 1841. He was delighted with all he saw, remained in the Holy City five weeks, making sketches and notes, and left Alexandria for home. In Constantinople we find him, on his fifty-fifth birthday, in good health and spirits; but, at Malta he indulged in fruit and lost, and inflammation set in. As the ship cleared the harbor, he died, almost suddenly, on June 1, 1841. The vessel put back, and on the same evening, by torchlight, WILKIE's body was buried in the "vast and wandering grave" of the Mediterranean.

His loss was deeply regretted by his countrymen, to whose interest he was always devoted. He was equally regretted by his brother artists, and TURNER put, in his own imaginative way, their sorrow upon canvas. Shortly after WILKIE's death, Mr. THORNBURY tells us that the following conversation took place between TURNER and his friend Mr. G. Jones:

"T. "I suppose no one, will do anything to commemorate WILKIE?"

J. "I shall pay a humble tribute by making a drawing representing his funeral."

"T. "How will you do it?"

J. "On the deck of the vessel, as it has been described to me, at the time when WILKIE's body was lowered into the sea."

T. "Well, I will do it as it must have appeared off the coast."

The drawing and picture were exhibited at the next Academy, TURNER's under the title, "Peace—Burial at Sea."

The steamer is seen lying largely on the calm water. A great mass of torchlight fills the middle of the deck, where the figures cluster round the funeral ceremony. The sails hang loosely on the yards, as black as TURNER could make them. The ship looks like a vast monument of mourning, hung with crape from giant looms. The sea ripples peacefully below, the sky above is lofty and at rest—light clouds scattered over a depth of evening air. The Rock of Gibraltar (near which TURNER supposed him buried) rises white and ghostly in the distance; a rocket shoots skyward from the land; the moon has just risen, and a pencil of light wavers downward into the water, from her silver horns. All nature is at rest in the peace of slowly moving life; but the darkness of death and sorrow shrouds the black ship where the cunning hand of art grew cold.

STANFIELD, when he saw the picture, remonstrated: "The effect is untrue; so is the color; no sails in the world could ever seem so black; it is an impossible effect."

The criticism was just; but TURNER growled out, "I only wish I could make them blacker." He was slender or too stout to be in perfect harmony with the figure of this famous goddess. The Venus de Medici was discovered in the villa of Hadrianu, at Tivoli.

COLUMBIA'S ROLL OF HONOR.

The following impromptu verses, by Geo. Lansing Taylor, Class of 1851, were read at the late annual meeting of the Alumni of Columbia College, in response to the toast, "Our Roll of Honor:"

I.

Columbia's Roll of Honor!—
Speak softly every name.
Our eighteen braves whose sacrificed graves
Are green with patriot fame;
A sweetness and a glory
Like dew and sunshine rest
O'er all their dust, a holy trust,
Thrice honored, more than blessed.

II.

All honor, brave Phil. Kearny,
Knee-Deeper and Le Roy,
Thurston and Tremor, Morris told,
And Parker, Massett, Floy;
Jenks, Parkinson, Reynolds, Tracy,
King, Marvin, Rice and Ray,
Death found them true, our boys in blue,
Now crowned with fadeless bay.

III.

We sent them forth with shouting,
From old Columbia's Hall,
With manly cheers and manly tears,
To conquer or to fall!
Now Alma Mater weeping,
Still moans her dear boys slain,
While we who share their triumphs sweet
They have not died in vain!

IV.

O, "dulce et decorum,
Pro patria mori!"
How smell their thought, while this they read,
That theirs such boast should be!
O, Bard of old Vaucluse,
Thy words, while centuries fly,
Fire Freedom's brave her cause to save,
Or for her sake to die!

V.

Long live our veteran comrades
Of that proud ninety-nine!
Bright Hesse's ray still light their way
To nobler deeds divine!
And evermore, when Freedom
In her strong anguish cries,
With hearts of flame to purge her shame,
Columbia's sons shall rise!

CHARLES LAMB IN THE TEMPLE.

The following charming and characteristic letter of Mary Lamb to a child is published in the Pall Mall Gazette. The "Little Barbara" (afterward Mrs. Edwards) to whom it was addressed was the youngest sister of Matilda Betham, a poetess whom Southey valued, and of Sir William Betham, the well-known genealogist and antiquary:

Nov. 9, 1814.

To Miss Barbara Betham:

It is very long since I have met with such an agreeable surprise as the sight of your letter, my kind young friend, afforded me. Such a nice letter as it is, too. And what a pretty hand you write! I congratulate you on this attainment with great pleasure, because I have so often felt the disadvantage of my own wretched handwriting.

You wish for London news. I rely upon your sister Ann for gratifying you in this respect, yet I have been endeavoring to recollect whom you might have seen here, and what may have happened to them since, and this effort has only brought the image of little Barbara Betham, unconnected with any other person, so strongly before my eyes that I seem as if I had no other subject to write upon. Now I think I see you with your feet propped upon the fender, your two hands spread out upon your knees—an attitude you always chose when we were in familiar confidential conversation together—telling me long stories of your own home, where now you are moping on Christmas with the same thing every day, for which then presented nothing but pleasant recollections to your mind. How well I remember your quiet steady face bent over your book. One day, conscience-struck at having wasted so much of your precious time in reading, and feeling yourself, as you prettily said, "quite useless to me," you went to my drawers and hunted out some unhemmed pocket-handkerchiefs, and by no means could I prevail upon you to resume your story-books till you had hemmed them all. I remember, too, your teaching my little maid to read—your sitting with her a whole evening to console her for the death of her sister; and that she in her turn endeavored to give some comfort to you the next evening, when you wept at the sight of Mrs. Holcroft from whom school you had recently eloped because you were not partial to sitting in the stocks. Those tears, and a few you once dropped when my brother teased you about your supposed fondness for apple dumplings, were the only interruptions to the calm contentedness of your unclouded brow. We still remain the same as you left us, neither better nor wiser, nor perceptibly older; but three years must have made a great alteration in you. How very much, dear Barbara, I should like to see you!

We still live in Temple-lane, but I am now sitting in a room you never saw; soon after you left us we were disturbed by the cries of a cat, which seemed to proceed from the garrets adjoining to ours, and only separated from ours by the locked door on the further side of my brother's bedroom, which you know was the little room at the top of the kitchen stairs. We had the lock forced and let poor puss out from behind a panel of the wainscot, and she lived with us from that time, for we were in gratitude bound to keep her, as she had introduced us to four untenanted unowned rooms, and by degrees we have taken possession of these unclaimed apartments—first putting up lines to dry our clothes, then moving my brother's bed into one of them, and now I sometimes think his own room. And last Winter, my brother being unable to pursue a work he had begun, owing to the kind interruptions of friends who were more at leisure than himself, I persuaded him that he might write at the case in one of these rooms, as he could not then hear the door-knock, or hear himself denied to be at home, which was sure to make him call out and convict the poor maid in a fib. Here, I said, he might be almost really not at home. So I put in an old grate, and made him a fire, in the largest of these spaces, and carried in one table and one chair, and bid him write away, and consider himself as much alone as if he were in some lodging in the midst of Salisbury Plain, or any other wild unfrequented place where he could expect few visitors; but I break in upon his solitude. I left him quite delighted with his new acquisition, but in a few hours he came down again with a sadly dismal face. He could do nothing, he said, with those bare whitewashed walls before his eyes. He could not write in that dull unfurnished prison.

The next day, before he came home from his office, I had gathered up various bits of old carpeting to cover the floor, and to a little break the blank look of the bare walls. I hung up a few old prints that used to ornament the kitchen, and after dinner, with great boast of what an improvement I had made, I took Charles once more into his new study. A week of busy labors followed, for which I think you would not have disliked to have been our assistant. My brother and I almost covered the walls with prints, for which purpose he cut out every print from every book in his old library—sending in every new and then, as he said, to see if there was a fresh poor author—which he might pelt do, you know, without my permission, as I am elder sister. There was such pasting, such consultation where their portraits, and where a series of pictures from Ovid, Milton and Shakespeare would show to most advantage, and in what obscure corner authors of humbler note might be allowed to tell their stories. All the books gave up their stories but one, a translation from Ariosto—a delicious set of four-and-twenty prints, and for which I had marked out a conspicuous place; when lo! we found at the moment the volume were going to work that a part of the book was pasted at the back of every plate. What a terrible disappointment! We consoled this dog story about nothing the poor dupes of Barrett is now called the print-room, and it become our most favorite sitting-room. Your sister Anne will tell you that your friend Louisa is going to France. Miss Shipley is out of town; Mrs. Reynolds desires to be remembered to you, and so does my neighbor Mrs. Norris, who was your doctress when you were unwell. Her three little children have grown three big children. The lions still live in Exeter Change. Returning home through the Strand, I often hear them roar about 12 o'clock at night. I never hear them without thinking of you, because you seemed so pleased with the sight of them, and said your young companions would stare when you told them you had seen a lion. And now, my dear Barbara, farewell; I have not written such a long letter a long time, but I am very, very sorry, I had nothing amusing to write about. Wishing you may pass happily through the rest of your school days, and every day of your life, I remain, your affectionate friend.

M. Lamb.

My brother sends his love to you, with the kind remembrance your letter showed you have of us as I was. He joins with me in respects to your good father and mother. Now you have begun, I shall hope to have the pleasure of hearing from you again. I shall always receive a letter from you with very great delight.

SORROWS OF RUSSIAN WOMEN.

From the Saturday Review, Sept. 13.

The position of the Russian women has long been a very painful one. One of the finest of the poems of Nekrassov, the chief living Russian poet, commences with a description of the sufferings of the great mass of his country women. "Ages have passed," he says, "and everything else in the world has been often changed and improved. But God has forgotten to alter the dreary lot of the peasant women. And so the old type of the strong and beautiful Slavonian woman has deteriorated. Poor victims of fate! you have suffered unheard. You have never made known to the world the voice of your complaining. You have passed silently through a terrible struggle, and now we see in you the very embodiment of lifelong fear and suffering." Undoubtedly the Russian peasant women too often have a look of the kind which the poet describes, an expression such as one might expect to find on the faces of persons who have been subjected to much hardship, and who have lived in the perpetual expectation of punishment—a worn and anxious look, and an air as though of premature old age. Much of this is doubtless due to the severity of the climate, with its cutting Wintry blasts and its scorching Summer suns; but though the weather may tan the skin and account for its unpleasantly wizened appearance, it would be unfair to charge it with all the restless suspicion of the eye, all the melancholy curve of the mouth. Much of that must be considered the result of neglect and unkindness. Even where the husband has not been brutal, he has almost to a certainty been contemptuous. For not only has the peasant been in the habit of treating his wife as a slave, but he has always looked down upon her in all good faith as a very inferior animal. This masculine contempt has been in part accounted for by the custom prevalent among the peasants, in the days of serfdom, of going away from their villages to the towns, in order to procure the obrok, or sum of money annually due to their lords. The man went forth into the world, and experience enlarged his mind, or at least expanded his circle of ideas; but the woman remained at home, confined within a very narrow range of thought, knowing nothing of what was going on at a distance from her own little village, never reading new faces, never hearing an unfamiliar voice. Now that the peasant is a freeman, he has no longer any obrok to pay; but the habit of roaming about the country has been confirmed, and he is likely to keep it up. When the husband returns from his travels he naturally comes to the conclusion that his wife is even more foolish than he had always supposed her to be, and he is more than ever convinced of the truth of those opinions which have given rise to a great number of popular proverbs, such as "A woman's hair is long, but her mind is short," "Don't go talking with women; every one knows that women are fools," "A hen isn't a bird, nor is a woman a human being," "A dog is wiser than a woman; it doesn't go barking at its master."

It is true that while the Russian woman is young and good-looking she may manage to exercise some influence over her lord and master, and even to keep him away for a time from the Kabak, the pot-house in which he laps himself in what are to him the pleasures of Elysium. But as soon as she loses the fast-fleeting charm of personal attractiveness, all power passes away from her forever, and she becomes a mere slave, little better than a beast of burden, obliged to obey the behests of one who is too often a brutal master. If she were intellectually, as she is morally, her husband's equal, if not his superior, there might be some chance for her. But, unfortunately, even if the village has provided the means of education, there is little chance of her having been able to avail herself of them. The man may have gone to school; it is almost certain that the woman has not. In olden days, it is true, the peasants were on the same dead level of ignorance, whether they were styled "souls" or not—that is to say, whether they were male or female chattels. But during the reign of Nicholas a number of popular schools were set on foot in the villages, and ten years ago, according to Gerbersof, the number of pupils frequenting them was in the proportion of 923 to every hundred thousand inhabitants. It is true that in Germany the number of pupils would have been 8,888, but still the figures showed that progress had been made. Since that time the schools have become much more numerous, and the number of boys attending them has grown larger every year. But as far as the peasant women are concerned, very little progress has been made. For the official tables show that the number of girls frequenting the primary schools is about one-eighth of the number of the boys who attend them. From this fact it seems fair enough to draw the conclusion that "the gulf which now divides the man of the people from his wife will become still wider in ensuing generations." If nothing be done to close it.

The reason which the peasants allege for refusing to send their girls to school is twofold. In the first place, they say that they distrust the schoolmasters; in the second, they declare that they cannot see what use reading and writing will be to their daughters. So far as the teachers are concerned there is some excuse for such refusal. Most of the schoolmasters are extremely incompetent persons, and it is very difficult to replace them with advantage. Their salaries are so small that no one becomes a schoolmaster who can get any other post. The worst-paid servant of the State, the least valuable clerk in a commercial establishment, receives more than even a favored village pedagogue, so that the class which is to educate Young Russia has to be recruited from the ranks of "plucked" students and "stickit" ministers, or from those of retired non-commissioned officers or private soldiers, or the sons or persons employed in the lowest classes of the Civil Service. As the supply of even such teachers at already exist is by no means equal to the demand, it is difficult to see how the number of schools the establishment of which M. Scherbo-Ferroff thinks necessary can ever be provided with masters, for, assuming that there are 8,000,000 of Russian children of a school-going age, he considers that the country stands in need of at least 160,000 primary schools. How to produce an equal number of good and trustworthy schoolmasters is a problem of no small difficulty.

The Horrity of Dramatic Authors.—The London Star, taking for its text the production of "Progress" by Mr. Robertson, "adapted from the French," discusses the subject of these adaptations and alterations from French plays. With reference to Mr. Robertson's play we are told:

It was very little altered, and not much adapted, for the English stage. There were many who said in print that Mr. Robertson's comedy of 'School' was adapted, and Mr. Robertson, though he was as we think, satisfactorily defended, did not himself offer to the public a point blank assertion of the originality of that play. A not unnatural conclusion, therefore, to have arrived at on seeing the honest bill of Saturday night, would have been that Mr. Robertson had some idle impropriety of taking credit for the ideas of others, and that he meant to borrow not borrowed plays in future. In Mr. Robertson's first successful comedy, 'Society,' there was one scene remarkable for its originality. It was that in which five shillings was borrowed at a humble journalist's lodgings by a most circuitous method, and repaid in the same manner. It is generally said that this incident was of French origin, and if the fact could have been at once taken notice of, the charge of plagiarism would, no doubt, have been made by all but personally friendly critics. Yet it might have been hypercritical to have insisted that Mr. Robertson should have avowed this very minute circumstance in the bill. Some may say, 'What matters, so long as a certain effect is produced?' And this, undoubtedly, would have been a fair question in times when a play was a manufactured article, for providing the words for which the author received a less proportion of the profits than falls to the share of a Manchester designer, when the manufacturer sells his stock of a particular print. But in these times an author is a highly paid man. Managers hardly ever accept anything except from writers with names and successes, and they receive large sums. There are cases in which, where no sharing terms are agreed upon, authors receive £800 or £1,000 down, and a stipulation for 2% every time of performance, for very ordinary three-act plays. These are immense terms, and they are secured, first, by diffusing the impression that there is something very occult in a playwright's art; and, secondly, by keeping up such a degree of uncertainty as to the amount of originality in plays as enables authors to get prices for weak and stolen pieces almost as high as they get for others which are strong and original. There is something radically unsound in a dramatist receiving for what is little more than a translation the price of an original work; and we beg leave to tell managers that so long as they pay these terms, they are simply throwing away profits, for want of knowing how to conduct their business.

FOREIGN NOTES.

The Scientific Congress of France has just held its thirty-sixth session at Chartres (Eure-et-Loir) under the Presidency of M. de Caumont. The proceedings lasted eight days, and consisted of the discussion of different questions relating to the physical, natural, and medical sciences, agriculture, manufactures, mechanics, history, literature, and the fine arts. The principal learned associations in France were represented, and several foreign savants were present.

The Paris Avenir National, according to a notice which it had given, did not appear on Sept. 21, in consequence of the day being the anniversary of the abolition of royalty and the proclamation of the Republic by the Convention in 1792.

A Paris letter in the Nord newspaper says that one of the most striking facts of the day is the continual and rapid increase in the number of bankruptcies in that city. As far back as 1858 the Minister of Justice, in his general report, remarked that the amount had more than doubled during the last fifteen years for all France; in passing from the quinquennial period (1856-1860) to the following, (1861-1865,) the proportional increase for Paris was thirty-six per cent.

The architect Geymüller has made an important discovery in the collections of the Uffizi Gallery, at Florence. Among the architectural drawings he not only hit upon Bramante's original design for St. Peter's, at Rome, but fifty-two other designs which appear to have been sent as concurrents for the prize. They throw great light upon the architectural ideas of Bramante's time. The discoverer intends to have the series photographed.

A monument to the memory of the Empress Catherine II., of Russia, is being erected in St. Petersburg. The pedestal will be surrounded with groups representing the principal personages of the epoch—Potemkin, the Empress' favorite, Marshal Suwarrow, Rumjanzow, Dessorodko, Dershawin, and the Princess of Ashkow.

A journeyman mason of the Tyrol five years ago laid down his trowel and entered the studio of the painter Pilotz, in Munich, as a disciple. The Vienna exhibition of this year contains a picture by Rumpler, which is an episode in Horzn's campaign against the French, in 1809, which is pronounced by the critics to be one of the best works of the year.

While immorality and vice have of late years increased in Paris in a manner astounding to behold, and appear to be increasing every day, a greater number of persons belonging to the lower orders have contracted marriages than at any former period. Going into religion means, among women, becoming a nun, and among men joining one of the "regular orders." A few weeks back Prince De Broglie turned Jesuit; a month ago a Captain in the Imperial navy, the possessor of a title and a good estate, laid all aside and joined the Carmelites; and Count Portalis, a nephew of Baron Haussmann, the famous Prefect of Paris, resigned a Government appointment and entered a religious house.

An elderly unmarried lady, a near relation of Humboldt's, and bearing the same name, had become so reduced as to be obliged to support herself by needlework. The corporation of Berlin has just granted her a life annuity sufficient to relieve her of all anxiety for her declining days.

Marshal Pate, before leaving Paris, attended a mass in pursuance of a vow which he made in case his insurrection of last year should be successful. He celebrated the anniversary of the revolt religiously. It was not suspected that he was such a good Catholic.

The Emperor Napoleon, declares the London Court Journal, refuses nothing to those who surround him and is a true friend in need. Several of his relations and many young officers with pecuniary help, who have more frequently got into a "tight place," and a certain drawer in the Tuileries, called "Pandora's box," is never empty, and always the hand is put in to relieve the necessitous according to their wants. Stamps, it is not, but money is never wanting. He does not save. When General Rollin, the Keeper of the Privy Purse, announced to him that he saved the household 20,000f. in one month, and asked what to do with the fruits of his economy, he was told to put it in his pocket.

According to the English papers, a scimitar or curved sword, that has evidently lain a long time in the bed of the Firth of Forth, has been brought up in an oyster dredge, from the scalps in the vicinity of Leith Roads. The sword is either of French or Turkish manufacture. The hilt is brass, with some figures and letters on it. The scabbard is leather. Some antiquarians who have seen it think the relic may have been brought from the battle of Pinkie, or Musselburgh, in the time of the regency of Mary of Lorraine, by the English troops.

The editorship of the London Gazette has called up a crowd of candidates. It is, however, said that this profusely-paid sinecure will be abolished by the Government. On the other hand, Mr. Blanchard Jerrold, we understand, is a candidate, and, it is said, with the support of the Prime Minister himself.

The Union prints information in regard to the vintage of the present year in France. In the Bordelais, it says, a small crop is spoken of, but of good average quality; the same holds the case in the basin of the Rhone, the Maconnais and the Beaujolais. In the Charentes the yield is much abundant; but in the basin of the Loire it is only tolerable. In the Vosges wines have suffered much from the frosts, and this department is the worst off of any. The Cotes-d'Or looks for an average yield. Lastly, the valleys of the Marne, Moselle and Rhine expect an average return; but the quality is still undecided. Extreme heat has been in these districts than in the others. These indications denote the making of an estimate of the probable product of the vintage of 1873 as about 47,000,000 hectolitres.

INTERESTING LAW SUIT.

A Claim by Stanton Blatchford, of Michigan, for Services as Administrator.

From the Detroit Tribune, Oct. 4.

A suit of some interest, and one likely to consume considerable time, was commenced in the Wayne Circuit Court yesterday afternoon, it being the appeal of Hon. Jacob M. Howard from the decision of the Judge of Probate in the matter of the estate of Antoine Beaubien, deceased. The reason of the appeal was that claims of Mr. Howard, (who acted as special administrator of the estate,) for services therein amounting in the aggregate to nearly $6,000, were not allowed by the Probate Judge. Antoine Beaubien died in the city, Jan. 25, 1869, and about two weeks previous to his death he executed and signed a will known as the Eldridge will, which bequeathed all his property to his children, who had married had in life by her children by a former husband, Joseph A. Monoet, the husband of one of Beaubien's step-daughters, was appointed executor of the will, and on Jan. 29, 1869, Mr. Monoet presented the will to the Probate Court for probate and allowance. It was contended that the heirs-at-law would contest it, and, on Jan. 30, Mr. Monoet applied to Mr. Howard to act as counsel to sustain its validity. He accepted a retainer, and agreed to become the collector. The heirs-at-law of the deceased petitioned that the will be set aside, and claimed that a will previously made, known as the Van Dyke will, and which had been destroyed by the deceased, when the Eldridge will was signed, but a copy of which was in existence, was the legal and only valid will. The matter was very warmly contested before the Probate Judge, Mr. Benjamin Hawley, for twenty-one days, when he decided, in favor of the Van Dyke will. Mr. Howard was then appointed special administrator, and the case was appealed to the Circuit Court, where the decision was sustained. Mr. Howard then, as special administrator, applied to have the Van Dyke will set up as the right will, and the case having been contested for six weeks, that document was appointed.

Mr. Howard claimed payment for his services as an attorney under the Eldridge will, before he was appointed special administrator, and for services in that and extraordinary as such administrator, amounting to $6,000. Of this sum the Judge of Probate allowed him only $1,000 for services as administrator. Mr. Howard also put in a claim for $412 72; paid to the widow of the deceased, $1,262 18; paid to the creditors of the deceased, and other items amounting in the aggregate to about $150 more, all of which the Judge of Probate refused to allow, and which the appellant asks to have allowed by the Court.

The defence claim that the Eldridge will was made by the deceased, Antoine Beaubien, in favor of his step-children, by means of the undue influence of his last wife, and under circumstances which made it invalid; that the services of Mr. Howard were rendered in a party defeating the will, and that for the payment of these services he should look to the person who employed him and who expected to be benefited in case the Eldridge will was approved; that the Probate Judge allowed him all that was justand legal; that while acting as special administrator, Mr. Howard acted contrary to the express requirements of the law in paying money to the widow of the deceased, or in settling his debts.

The trial commenced yesterday about A o'clock P. M., and will probably continue two or three days. Mr. J. M. Howard is conducting the case for himself, as the appellant, and is assisted by Mr. A. B. Maynard, and Mr. W. P. Wells acts for the appellee.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The Losses by the Rebellion.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

A statement appeared in your paper of the 4th inst., in regard to the "Confederate losses in the late civil war," prepared by Dr. Joseph Jones, Secretary of the Southern Historical Society. According to the estimates made by the writer, the total number of deaths were about 260,000. That this is an under estimate will easily appear from the following considerations: It is stated that during the years 1861-2 19,097 were killed in battle, and 4,241 only died from wounds, although during the same years 72,718 were wounded. Now it is the experience of all armies that a vastly greater number die from wounds than are killed outright. The above estimate makes the proportion as nearly five to one, that is five killed where one died from his wounds. Our Union armies lost during the four years of the war, 96,000 either killed or died from their wounds, and 184,901 who died from disease, making a total of 280,455 in a total aggregate of 2,556,811 men. These results are very surprising when compared with similar official returns of other armies, especially in foreign wars. In the Mexican War our losses in deaths from disease were, compared with the deaths in battle and from wounds, at about eight to one. In the Crimean War those of the French were nearly seven to one; those of the English as four to one. In our late war, in the Union armies, the deaths from disease were as to the deaths in battle and from wounds a little over two to one. These ratios are the best proof we could have of the splendid efficiency of our army. Sanitary regulations, the skill and faithfulness of the army medical corps, and of the thoroughness and efficiency of our United States Sanitary Commission's work. According to Dr. Jones, during the two years 1861-2, 24,143 men died in the Confederate armies, killed or died from wounds, while only 31,528 died from disease, being in a ratio of 1.39, while it is well known that the deaths from disease in the Southern armies were relatively vastly greater in number than in the Union forces. This was due partly to the inferiority of their sanitary arrangements and their want of food, of quinine and other necessary articles of medicines.

We are also told by Dr. Jones that during the years 1862-3-5, 29,376 men were killed, and 121,313 wounded; how many of the latter died is not stated, but a larger proportion undoubtedly than in the Union armies, owing to causes already stated. Estimating the Confederate armies at 600,000 total for the whole war as given by Dr. Jones, and the Union armies at 2,556,811, the number of deaths in the Confederate armies should have been only 73,928, if in the same relative proportion to the whole number as the deaths in the Union armies, instead of 185,000. But no accurate estimate can be made of the Confederate losses during the last two years, for the reason that, as stated by Dr. J., as no returns of deaths in field and general hospitals were made, or at least been found, in the Confederate archives. From information collected personally at the South, from Southern surgeons connected with the Southern army, just at the close of the war, I am satisfied that the mortality in the Confederate armies during the last two years of the conflict, was as three to one compared to that of the Union army.

International Exhibition at Saragossa, Spain.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

A grand International Exhibition, or World's Fair, will take place on the 1st day of September, 1876, in Saragossa, the capital of Aragon, one of the most advanced and agricultural Provinces in Spain. The exhibition will consist of all articles and productions belonging to sciences, arts, agriculture, industry, mechanics, &c., and it may be a valuable information to American manufacturers, artists and tradesmen, to state that all objects forwarded to said exhibition shall enter Spain free of duty and pay only half rates of freight for transportation on all Spanish railways, and that no charges will be made for room and use of stand in the exhibition building. The late revolution in Spain has opened a new scope for the development of industry and agriculture, and the exhibition of American inventions and productions may prove of great advantage to the contributors.

The Law on Concealed Weapons.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

In an article in Thursday's paper you say that more stringent provisions in the law against concealed weapons would prevent such cases of killing as that of Robert. How? The gang in the case you alluded to deliberately assembled to murder a man in defiance of the law which is plain against murder. Would a law against carrying pistols have prevented this? It might have prevented the victim having a pistol to defend himself with, and thus insured his being murdered in cold blood; but that is all it could have effected. The law has no terrors for these "gang" men. They know very well that while they have political influence, and the Courts are manipulated by popular election, they will not be punished.

The remedies for these street killings are plain: Make a police force that shall be strong, always equally responsible, without regard to which pistol shot proves fatal; and, secondly, provide a Judiciary independent of popular votes—at least, directly applied. No change less than this in the law and practice of New-York will serve to make life reasonably safe.

Public School Teaching—The Board of Education Report.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I have read with much pleasure your editorial upon the proposed reforms of the Board of Education, and agree with you in commending them. The suggestion of the committee that the number of pupils in a class be increased from thirty-five to fifty seems to me, however, a mischievous one. Having spent a number of years, before entering upon my present vocation, in teaching in the ward schools, it seemed to me that classes were taught rather than scholars; that the memory was trained instead of the intellect. Lessons were got by rote and such boys who could not keep up with the place" stayed behind until the next promotion. The reason always given for this state of things was that there was no time for individual instruction. If the size of a class is increased forty-five per cent, will not the time now devoted to explaining lessons to dull children be largely taken up in hearing recitations?

As to what can be done by individual teaching, some of our New-York teachers would be surprised at the results obtained by a Yankee "school marm," on a salary of $25 a month, with an average attendance of twenty different grades, from a, b, c to quadratic equations. A New-England schoolboy may be ignorant of many of the fancy studies of our grammar schools, but he knows how to think. Respectfully yours,

X.

The Lockwood Failure—A Card.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Sir: If your issue of Saturday last in an article headed "Messrs. Lockwood & Co." a statement is repeated which has appeared once or twice before in your columns, that "a large amount is due from them to Stillman Witt, of Cleveland, Ohio, and many other wealthy Western capitalists." In the absence of Mr. Witt, who has been some months in Europe, will you permit me, as his attorney, to say through your columns that, so far as he is concerned, there is no foundation in the statement. Mr. Witt is neither a creditor nor a debtor of Messrs. Lockwood & Co. to the amount of a single dollar, having had no transactions with that firm for many months.

Very truly yours,

DAN. P. ELIS.

Knights of St. Patrick.

During the last session of the Legislature this popular Society was incorporated, the incorporators numbering many of our leading Irish fellow-citizens. By the act of incorporation the Society is permitted to lease stock to the amount of $100,000 to enable them to build a St. Patrick's Hall. On Friday the Board of Directors met and organized, and elected the following gentlemen as officers: Chairman, Captain William F. Lyons; Vice Chairman, E. J. Shandley; Secretary, John H. Hackett, and Treasurer, Richard B. Connolly. Our Irish fellow-citizens being wealthy and numerous, there can be no doubt that St. Patrick's Hall will soon be a feature of this City. The Board of Directors promise to push the enterprise forward with energy. The building is to contain a large hall, library, reading room, lecture and society rooms. The stock is to be taxed in shares of $10 each. We wish the worthy Knightsmen success.

MILITARY GOSSIP.

The parade of the First Division on Wednesday was a gratifying one, though the attentive observer could scarcely fail perceiving certain irregularities that should be remedied. A little more attention to minor details will prove very beneficial in the future. In the first place the diversity of uniform in the staff was especially noticeable. The Division staff wore the steeple-crowned and stiff-brimmed hat so much in vogue during the last year of the war. The First Brigade have the soft felt hat and black plume, the Second Brigade wore chapeaus and variegated plumes, while the Third Brigade was in fatigue, and the Fourth Brigade staff totally omitted the parade altogether. The Governor's staff were in full uniform and chapeaus, and made a brilliant appearance. Steps should be taken to establish uniformity in this respect, for the staff officer is generally considered the model for the line. The staffs of Generals Burges and Varian usually conform to the regulations, and make a fine appearance; why should not the others do as well, especially as so much attention is now paid to dress? In the regiments we noticed that the Seventy-first, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, Fifty-fifth, Eleventh and Twenty-second were deserving of high praise, as they are always careful in carrying out the details of their organization, in the way of full dress, equipments and general appearance of the officers and men. The Second is rather deficient in discipline, owing in great part to the negligence of the officers. The Twelfth, usually an effective body of men, did not appear to good advantage, owing to the wear and tear of uniforms. We trust that this really fine regiment will soon take a decided step in the opposite direction and parade in the Spring in new dress. The Sixth is rapidly improving under the genial auspices of Colonel Mason, who had, however, considerable work before him yet, and the line officers owe it to themselves and their regiment that the Colonel receive earnest support at their hands. The Eighty-fourth is doing well, and Colonel Conkling has evidently regenerated his command, a fact we are glad to record, as there was at one time abundant room for improvement. The Ninety-sixth made a good show in their new uniforms, though the officers should change their style of dress also, as they are now in utter contrast to the rank and file. The Eighth need a new dress very much, not because their present one is worn out, but because the other commands make a more dashing appearance in full uniform, and the Greys should not be left behind. The Thirty-seventh made as good an appearance as can be expected under the circumstances connected with the organization. The discipline of the Fifty-fifth is not as strict as it should be, for, besides other signs, we saw two sergeants carrying the extra muskets of runaways. The Fourth were beneath criticism, notwithstanding General De Lacy's earnest efforts. The Sixty-ninth is improving, though we cannot say as much for the Seventy-ninth. In the Cavalry Brigade matters appear to be going from bad to worse, and our militia cavalryman has become one of the greatest caricatures imaginable. The domestic troubles of the Washington Greys appear to be tearing the command to pieces. Nothing is so necessary in a military organization as a constant aim at improvement, therefore these hints are given as a spur, not to wound, but to excite a proper ambition.

The First Regiment did not parade on Wednesday in consequence of their uniform not being ready, only seventy-five men having been provided. As the officers are endeavoring to improve the appearance of their command, their request for leave of absence was a reasonable one, and evinces a proper spirit and pride. This will soon be the only veteran organization in the City, and we are glad to see that the members are proud of their designation.

The question of a parade ground for the National Guard seems to be coming up in a practical shape. Governor Hoffman, who has already evinced a warm interest in our citizen soldiery, announced in a speech, the other day, that he would endeavor to secure a suitable piece of turf ground in Central Park for the use of the First Division. We hope that he will be successful, for Tompkins-square will always be a nuisance. The open stretch of grass land lying near the Seventh and Eighth avenue gates in the Park would be an admirable location, as spectators could be kept off the turf and yet have ample room.

The following is the adopted programme for the entertainment of the First Light Infantry, of Providence, during their visit to this City: The Twenty-second Regiment will leave the armory, on the 13th inst., at 8 o'clock, in full dress, and march down Broadway to foot of Canal-street, where they will receive their guests, escort them through Broadway, Union-square, Fourth-avenue, Madison-avenue and down Fifth-avenue to the armory, where a collation will be served and an address delivered by Mayor Hall. After which, the Providence guests will go into quarters at the Everett House. In the evening a complimentary reception will be given at the Twenty-second Regiment Armory, to consist of a promenade concert until 10 o'clock, and dancing from 10 to 4 o'clock, while the armory will be appropriately decorated. The next day the Providence battalion will, under the special charge of B, D and G Companies, proceed to the foot of Twenty-eighth-street, East River, where a special steamer will convey them to the public institutions under the care of the Commissioners of Charities and Correction. The regimental bands will accompany the excursionists, and a collation will be served on the steamer. After visiting the institutions, the guests will depart for home via the Stonington line.

In Special Orders No. 219 Adjutant-General Townsend announces that it appearing to the satisfaction of the Commander-in-Chief upon his examination of the papers submitted in the matter of the complaint of Major Wm. H. Schultz against Brigadier-General Brooks Fielley, that no sufficient grounds exist for ordering a Court of Inquiry, the complaint is dismissed. We congratulate the Brigadier on the result.

Considerable annoyance has been experienced in the First Division among the brigade and regimental commanders, in having to counteract and change existing orders for inspections and drills in order that the parade of the Division could be made last week. The practice has been earnestly condemned as wholly unnecessary, and prejudicial to the interests of the service, and the efforts are not slow to express their opinion on the subject. Whether it will lead to any serious result is difficult to say. We trust not.

The field officers and the Adjutant of the Ninth Regiment assembled at Division Headquarters, in Mercer-street, Tuesday evening last, in citizens' dress, for theoretic instruction.

The Thirty-seventh Regiment will parade at the armory on the 27th inst. for inspection and review. Roll call at 7:15 P. M.

A Court Martial for the Cavalry Brigade has been ordered to assemble at the armory of the First Cavalry on the 1st of November. The Court will consist of Colonel John H. Hicks, Third Cavalry; Major John Mallon, First Cavalry; Captain Robert M. Cook, Battalion Washington Grays.

The Charter Election in Newark.

The election for city officers in Newark takes place on Tuesday next, and the contest between the rival candidates is becoming lively and earnest with the approach of election day. The Republicans have nominated Mr. F. W. Ricord and the Democrats Mr. A. A. Smalley for Mayor to succeed Hon. F. E. Pedden. Both candidates are popular with their party, and the parties are nearly equally divided, so that the contest is close, and the result is legitimately to be expected. Meetings have been held every evening during the present week in the different wards for the ratification of the nominations, the great meetings of the campaign were held Friday evening by both parties. They were attended by large audiences, and were addressed by prominent speakers.

THE LOBBY AT WASHINGTON.

Strength of the Railroad Influence—Excursion of Special Legislation.

Washington Correspondence of the Cincinnati Commercial.

I do not believe that any intelligent person, who has had opportunity to know the influences that affect Congress, will deny my assertion that the most formidable influence controlling the United States Senate are the national bank bitty and that of the Union Pacific and other railroads. The latter is the strongest, because it is able to put its own men into the Senate. I speak of that body because it is more susceptible there than in the House.

The public have not forgotten the circular issued by certain railroad Presidents, some year or so ago, when it was deemed possible that Congress might release this capital from its obligations to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and authorize the construction of other roads from New-York to the West and the South. It is quite certain that Senators hold seats in their Chamber by virtue of the favors they can give to important railroads from their respective States. Should one believe that Mr. Scott would be United States Senator from Pennsylvania had he not been first the attorney of the Pennsylvania Central? Certainly, one or both of the Maryland Senators represent the Baltimore and Ohio Road. When Cornelius Vanderbilt shall hereafter want a Senator here, or perhaps, under the influence of his young wife, want that dignity for himself, will he not be able to effect the election? Can Senators be elected from Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Nevada, California and Oregon, who may be new or hereafter as partisans with the Pacific Railroads and their affiliated lines?

I believe, there is a provision of law that Congress may regulate the tariff of fares and freights. Who supposes that there is any one of the fourteen Senators now representing these States who would even vote for the enforcement of such provision, let alone take the initiative, no matter how extravagant might be those tariffs? There is not one. Some of the Senators I have referred to were elected, so report says, through the influence of the railroads.

There are not only the seven States I have named, but the same great corporations will necessarily mold to their purposes the State organizations to be created in the Territories they are developing. Who that knows anything of politics, and how they are manipulated, will doubt but that when Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, New-Mexico and Arizona become States, that the transcontinental roads will not put into the Senate their open or secret attorneys? In the South the same thing will be true. Take Virginia, and General Marone, its railroad king, backed up by the influence of his ally, King Garrett, of the Baltimore and Ohio, will elect the Senator—one, at least. Tennessee has got into its government middle as much, or more, from certain railroad complications as anything else.

PROOF OF THEIR STRENGTH.

It is in combating this that the views which Butler champions will find themselves tested. It would be pertinent to this subject if next Winter some one in Congress will ask for information the following points: The amount of land granted each State for railroads, wagon roads and canals; the amount granted direct to any such enterprise; the number of sections and acres received by every such road, (wagon or rail,) and canals, and the quantity yet to be issued to them. It was stated last Winter by Hon. Simon Cameron, that 150,000,000 acres had already been given to the Pacific Railroads; 87,000,000 to other railroads; 17,000,000 for canals, and 60,000,000 of "swamp and overflowed land"—as subsidy for any internal improvement the State might execute, so that 90 to a year ago seemed to be the limit of public lands given by the nation for the purposes of internal improvement. That is sufficient to make 1,050,000 farms of 160 acres. It may fairly be deemed worth $1 an acre, for though much of it has sold or would sell for less, the larger portion would fetch much more. Up to the same date, the following subsidies had been paid:

	Miles completed.	Amount of bids issued.	Bids issued to Dec. 22, 1872.	Miles built in 6 m'ths.	To be built.
Central Pacific	250	$1,600,000	$1,600,000	50	.....
Union Pacific	800	24,073,000	8,120,000	120	180

NEWS OF THE DAY.

EUROPE.

The London Times, of yesterday, in an editorial on France, commends the moderation of M. KERATRY and his colleagues, and considers it an evidence that the country can control its own destinies. The writer thinks the opposition now combines three great elements of strength—Union, method and patience.

A serious riot is reported to have taken place among the miners of the Orleans Railway Company in the department of Aveyron, France. The riot lasted three days, and many acts of violence were committed. On Friday the mob was dispersed by the military, ten of them killed and quiet restored.

Father HYACINTHE has left Paris for this country, where he intends to remain for a few months.

The death of Baron HAUSSMANN at Bordeaux is contradicted.

Affairs in Spain are very unsettled, and bands of Republicans are creating disturbances in various Provinces. Madrid is reported quiet, but the citizens have been advised to arm themselves for protection in case of a riot.

Madrid dispatches state that 1,800 insurgents have surrendered to General BALDRICK. A sharp fight is reported in Saragossa, in which much blood was shed. The volunteers in Granada have refused to disarm, and escaped to the open country. The insurgents near Valls had thrown a railway train filled with troops from the track, by which four soldiers were killed and many wounded.

GENERAL.

The town of Eastport, Me., was visited by a terrific hurricane on Monday night, which destroyed property to the value of $600,000. Twenty-seven vessels are reported ashore at Rumney's Bay, and many of them are a total wreck. Seventeen lives are said to have been lost by the sinking of a bark in New-River, and the schooner Ble went down in St. Andrew's Bay with all on board.

Orders were issued yesterday by the various Departments at Washington, for the appropriate testimonials of respect to the memory of Ex-President PIERCE.

Admiral FARRAGUT is reported dangerously ill at Chicago, Ill., with congestion of the lungs. The death of ROBERT TOOMBS is momentarily expected at his home in Washington, Ga.

The will of the late Secretary of War, General JOHN A. RAWLINS, was yesterday admitted to probate in the Orphans' Court in Washington, D. C., and letters testamentary issued to President GRANT and Mrs. RAWLINS. His library he leaves to his son, and the Rawlins homestead in Illinois to his parents for their lifetime. Such other property as he died possessed of goes to his wife and children.

Father FERREN, the priest in charge of the Roman Catholic Church at Lynchburg, Va., was found dead in his bed on Thursday morning. His head being bruised, suspicion was aroused, and the affair is being investigated by a Coroner's jury.

The body of JAMES DOWLING was on Thursday found in the mill pond at Vernon, Conn., with the skull fractured. DOWLING had just returned from California, and had $600 in money, which he freely exhibited while on a spree last Monday. As he had been missing since that time, it is supposed that he was murdered and his body thrown into the pond.

The office of the Rock River Insurance Company at Belvoit, Wis., was broken into on the 2d inst., and $15,000 in Government bonds stolen, belonging to the Treasurer, J. A. CHAPMAN, and $20,000 in notes, the property of the Company.

The Indians in Dakota are reported as demoralized by the introduction of whisky, and more troops are asked for to keep them in order. General DUNCAN reports victories on the Republican River, and General AUGUR has arrived at Cheyenne with a deputation of Chiefs.

A great deal of property has been swept away and men injured by the freshet in the Swift River in Oxford County, Me., which rose thirty-six feet in twelve hours.

Vice-President COLFAX has arrived at Cheyenne, where he will remain for a few days, owing to the illness of his mother. Governor BROWN and the rest of the party have continued their journey East.

JEFFERSON DAVIS arrived in Baltimore, Md., yesterday, from England.

Judge SAWYER, of the District Court at San Francisco, Cal., has decided that Chinese testimony is admissible in the Courts, under the Fourteenth Amendment.

San Francisco advices announce the arrival on Thursday, of a number of prominent Eastern men, among whom is Governor WARD, of New-Jersey. A fire in that city on Friday destroying property worth $60,000, and caused the suspension of the Daily Herald newspaper.

Important mineral discoveries have been made in the neighborhood of Carson, Nevada, on the line of the Central Pacific Railway.

It is said that Governor SAFFORD, of Arizona, has offered General THOMAS 200 volunteers for a six months' campaign, all of them skilled in Indian warfare. In a riot at Prescott, Sept. 28, three soldiers are reported to have been killed, and Major McCOMBS, of the army, has been accidentally killed at Junction.

The British bark Jane A. Bishop, which sailed from Wilmington, Del., for Liverpool, some five weeks since, returned to the former port on Thursday on account of the sickness of the Captain, mate, and greater portion of the crew.

The flour, grist and saw mills, together with the cotton-gin building of WM. S. BATTLE, located at the Falls of Tar River, near Rocky Mount, N. C., were burned on Thursday and entirely consumed, with their contents, consisting of 60 bales of cotton, 1,000 bushels of wheat, and 1,500 bushels of corn. Loss $35,000; no insurance.

The steamer S. L. Felton, owned by the Wilmington and Baltimore Railway Company, was sunk yesterday by striking a rock in the Delaware River as she was coming into the dock at Claymont. No lives lost.

Delegates are arriving at Louisville, Ky., to attend the Commercial Convention. Ex-President FILLMORE reached that city yesterday.

The office of the Dutchess County Mutual Insurance Company at Poughkeepsie was entered by burglars Friday night, and the safe robbed of $27,000 in coupon bonds and some $20,000 of other securities.

A fire in Rochester last evening destroyed two buildings in the rear of the Rochester University, containing valuable cabinets belonging to the college. The loss is estimated at $60,000. Insurance, $40,000. Much of the property destroyed cannot be replaced.

Secretary BOUTWELL delivered an important speech in Philadelphia last night, in which he gave expression to his views on the financial policy of the Administration.

The Kate Bully, a Canadian vessel, is reported to have been recently capsized on Lake Michigan, and the Captain, mate and two seamen were lost.

The flags on the City Hall, public buildings, hotels, &c., were displayed at half-mast yesterday out of respect to the memory of the late Ex-President PIERCE, the President of the Order of the Lone Star, (THOMAS PIERCE) of which the Ex-President was a member, has ordered the usual tribute of respect to be paid to his memory.

An old iron kettle greatly rust-eaten, containing old Dutch coins, a knife and fork of exceedingly rude manufacture, and some Delft crockery, was unearthed yesterday by workmen engaged in digging for the foundation of the new Government pier at the Battery. It was doubtless buried or thrown away during the occupancy of Manhattan Island by the Knickerbockers. These antique relics are to be presented to the New-York Historical Society.

In the adjustment of accounts between Messrs. LOCKWOOD & Co. and their creditors, Mr. HORACE F. CLARK is attorney for the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad Company and Mr. R. P. CLARK for Messrs. LOCKWOOD & Co.

The East River Market, foot of Sixteenth-street, is finished, and the stands will be rented very soon. It is 347 feet long by 164 feet wide. The river shed will be used as a market for fish, oysters, &c.

Divorce Made Easy.

We are getting used to so many strange developments in the art of trickery and imposture that nothing ought to surprise us. We see men who in most other States of this Union would undoubtedly have been driven from contact with decent society, even if they had not long ago been invited to take their place in a felon's dock, here taking up prominent positions as "colossal speculators." It is held as nothing against them that they have brought ruin to hundreds of homes. People admire their "smartness" and enterprise just the same. If we want to study another phase of life, which we may fairly call a revival of our own invention, we have only to watch the manner in which Judges are bought and sold, like sheep at a fair, or brass chains on a huckster's tray. A man who has large dealings in stocks thinks his establishment incomplete until he owns a Judge or two. For practical purposes, a sign might as well be stuck up outside some of the Courts, setting forth plainly that justice is to be sold at an alarming sacrifice, and that no ready money will be refused. The scales of the goddess are only used to weigh the gold which both parties bring to bribe her with. We are getting used to all this, and to a reign of shame and imposition generally. A railroad, especially if it happens to be called the Erie Railway, is made a means of plundering the unwary passengers and everybody who goes near it. The shareholders are not entitled to much sympathy. People who play with sharp instruments must expect to be cut.

Among the more recent creations of knavery there is a trade which ought to become as infamous as some other callings which the law visits with its severest penalties. It is a profitable business, or it would not answer the purpose of so many rogues to follow it. The object of it is to procure divorces by means of fraud and perjury. The husband or wife who wishes to get rid of a disagreeable partner has only to go to some sharper calling himself an attorney, who advertises his readiness to get divorce without publicity, and who at once undertakes to do all the dirty work incidental to the case. If there is no evidence he forges or invents as much as he wants. If the man or woman against whom he is employed is innocent, he finds some one to lay all sorts of crimes to their charge. There is no vileness from which he would shrink. It is the daily business of his life to bear false witness, and he would at any time rather be paid to destroy character than to defend it. This latter peculiarity, it is true, one divorce-manager shares with men who would perhaps hesitate to practice some of his villainy. When public writers take to stabbing private reputations and enter into conspiracies to defame innocent persons, we can scarcely gibbet the miserable pettifogger as a scoundrel of the deepest dye.

We have indicated the superficial characteristics of the class which traffics in divorces. Particular examples will probably occur to all our readers, for they have been plentiful in the papers of late. In one case, a woman who had betrayed her husband wished to get a divorce from him, in order that she might live with the greater freedom with her paramour. No offence could be alleged against the husband as affording a ground for divorce. So the wife went to a man who carries on this atrocious business, and got him to trump up testimony sufficient to afford a pretext to the Judge for pronouncing a decision in her favor. The "attorney" found a wretch who was ready to take his oath to any statement put into his mouth. He then, with the assistance of the woman's paramour, prepared papers to lay before the Court, using three different colored inks, so as to show a dissimilarity between the body of the papers and the signatures. The latter were, of course, forged. The miserable creature who was hired to do the perjury in Court swore that he saw the husband enter a house of ill-repute. There was no corroborative testimony, and by the connivance of the Judge the husband was kept in total ignorance of the proceedings, so that he could not defend himself. Thus manipulated, the case was successfully hurried through the Court, and the wife completed her guilt by marrying a second time.

In this, and in a case subsequently brought to light, the decree of divorce was set aside in an appeal before a different tribunal. But that accident will not injure the traffic. It is based upon a wholesale wandering to the worst vices of humanity, and there are in every community some who have no scruples in using that or any other means which fell convenient to their hands and enabled them to pursue their career of guilt. When they have once entered upon a life of profligacy they are not debarred from taking any course which happens to suit them at the moment, because it is foul and disgraceful in character. It would be useless to hope for any change from them. But is it impossible to track out the delinquents who thus make it a profession to violate the whole code of law which has been constructed for the protection of society? The laxity of the marriage tie already threatens to become a public scandal. What will it be if these harpies who hang on the outskirts of the legal profession succeed in their to have their sphere much larger?

Postage Trade-Marks in America.

One of the happy results of the successful completion of the Pacific Railway across this continent has been the opening up of a new country to foreign travel. Europe and some portions of Asia and Africa, have been thoroughly explored by the intelligent, inquiring and educated of foreign tourists, but the length of the ocean passage, the illimitable extent of country to be traversed, and, above all, the uncertainty of the expense, the accommodations, and the necessaries of preparation, have hitherto deterred all but the most daring from venturing on the vast countries of the West. This Summer a party of foreign sportsmen have explored the plains buffalo hunting, and if report speaks truly, to the mutual satisfaction of both visitors and visited.

Among the many blessings conferred by increased means of intercommunication between nations by telegraphs, steamboats and railways, none is so important as the removal of barriers to good mutual understanding. Prejudices, as vast as mountain ranges, dividing neighboring peoples, have melted away. We know how much social intercourse does to cut down the angles and to soften the asperities of private and political antagonism. With increased and cheaper means of transport we shall see among us a larger number of the best of European society. We have already been ruffled by the very imperfect, and often malicious, representations of men and manners which have been from time to time published. But with a better and a wider acquaintance with us, we need no longer fear a repetition of such annoyances.

There is another consideration still more important. We cheerfully welcome already the rank and file of the hundreds of thousands of emigrants who come to strengthen the bone and sinew of our land. The first emigrants were men of mark, of education, and many of them of the highest culture and refinement. We may expect many of the same class now. The British Commissioner of the Oregon boundary landed at New-Orleans in an advanced stage of consumption, and left this country a hale and hearty man, after his exposure to the clear bracing air of our plains and mountains. Many another like him, having breathed the fresh pure air of our free Republic, may derive as wholesome a renovation morally as well as physically. It is the boast of America that she "welcomes the coming guest." How much more so when they are the generous and the gifted of other nations.

Winter Evenings in Cities.

The approach of Winter, with its long, dark evenings, renders timely one more allusion to a great need in most of our cities, and especially in New-York. It is that of evening occupation for the youth and rising manhood around us. There are already numerous methods of killing time; what is wanted is a means of employing time in such a manner that relaxation may be combined with real mental and physical benefit. The union of these advantages is in reality a source of the purest and most enduring pleasure, and influences for the better the whole course of the after life of those who resort to it.

We are afraid to say how many thousands of young men and young women in New-York have absolutely nothing to do or nowhere to go, that can be of the least use to them during the interval between the close of labor and the hour for sleep. Such find the time upon their hands heavy to an insupportable degree. They have, very probably never cultivated a taste for reading, or if they have, it has taken the direction of works of fiction, some of which are undoubtedly good in their way, but others of which are as undoubtedly bad. Of the class of literature a resort to which acts as a mental tonic they have little or no experience. It is the same with the home in which a family assembles, with the boarding house and its dreary parlor from which the inhabitants flee to the solitude of their own apartments, and the barracks for young men where every surrounding is hostile to study and destructive of healthy thought. Young men are the most unfavorably situated in this respect, for there are many feminine occupations which employ the fingers of great numbers of young women, and by which the brain is lulled into quiescence, but which the other sex cannot undertake. What wonder that so many of the former become merely idle loungers if not worse, and that turbulence and disorder are as common as they are.

And yet there is a method by which a part of the sought-for relief can be provided. The library and the reading room are, under proper conditions, an unfailing resource of which mortals dying of ennui can avail themselves. We have in the Cooper Institute an example of how large a number can be benefited by a single institution. Why are there not more; if not on so large a scale, at least on some scale? The system of Mechanics' Institutes, as they are termed in England, is one capable of almost indefinite extension, and its requirements in the way of material are few and easily satisfied. If the name be objectionable, though there is no knowing why it should be, that of "club" might be substituted. And the beginning of such clubs may be as unpretending as possible. A room with light and fire and seats and tables is the first necessity, some newspapers and periodicals the second, some books the next, and the plan can be enlarged by degrees until the paraphernalia of lectures, classes and reunions are complete. The expense of a beginning is but slight, and any half dozen active young men could gather around them members enough to render the experiment pecuniarily safe.

The subject is of great importance from another point of view than that of the mere supply of relaxation. There is a growing impression that the intellectual standard of the rising generation is deteriorated, and that, while there is more smartness of a certain sort, more self-confidence in matters of judgment, that which may be termed real knowledge and cultivation is deficient with respect to a large and increasing proportion of the young. Not that industry is doubted, or that bookworms are the most useful members of society. But there are mental powers the development of which is neglected for the most part, and which are of great consequence. It is not that a pupil at a public school shall gain a parrot-like knowledge of names, places and events; that boys or girls shall become a walking catalogue, and be able duly to exhibit a framed and glazed diploma, gained by assiduous falsely called study, that is the thing to be desired. The pupil needs to be able to form ideas. He needs the power to paint upon the retinas of his brain some picture of what his tongue has described. How little attention is paid to mischievous tendency of learning without thought as unhappily common may be known by asking a few questions of the most available pupil within the circle of the reader's acquaintance. Well, the public schools, good as they are in many respects, do not supply this inner light of book knowledge. They do not, indeed, profess to supply it. Nay more, they could not if they would. All that they can do is to provide the mass of the young population with the working tools of education, and that done, that first step is accomplished which is their chief duty. But unfortunately here the pupil suffers the process to end, in the great majority of cases. And the reason is that the home, whatever or wherever it be, offers no facilities for continued study. Social mental depreciation is the result, and it carries with it a lower tone of public thought, of public aims, and, as a natural consequence, of public honor and virtue. And it is just here that Mechanics' Institutes or Clubs, or by whatever other name they may be called, have their place. They can be made to carry on the work begun at school, and to utilize it where now it is almost useless; and they can at the same time surround the lives of the growing around us with some cheerful mitigations of evils perhaps inseparable from the struggles and trials of this age of hurry and hard work.

Postage Stamps Abroad and at Home.

It has been announced that we are to have another new set of postage stamps. The issue now in use will, therefore, be shortlived. We suppose it is indecorous to criticise that which is already moribund; but we may safely say it is not because the present stamps are beloved of gods or men, that they are taken away from us in their youth.

British conservatism is displayed even in these matters. Some thirty years ago the first postage stamps ever produced were issued in England, and among them there were some of the same size, design and general appearance as those of that country at the present day. In all those years the face of the fair VICTORIA has grown no older; neither time nor the engraver carves wrinkles on her honored brow. In France, on the contrary, the head of Liberty that illustrated the Republic of 1848, was supplanted by that of LOUIS NAPOLEON as soon as he became President. A year elapsed and a single word in the stamp was altered: the Republic became the Empire. Gradually the Government strengthened; the army increased; and in 1863 the mustache of NAPOLEON III., that had previously drooped, straightened out across the postage stamp, and his forehead was crowned with laurel. The first issues of Spain, in 1850, represent Queen ISABELLA with a nose upturned at a remarkable angle. Perhaps, subsequently, the shadow of her coming abdication depressed her feelings. It is quite certain that the features in question was noticeably toned down in later designs.

There has been a great variety of shapes and sizes among stamps. Different nations have produced octagonals, ovals, circles, squares; Cape Colony issued equilateral triangles, and some German States contrived stamps so constructed that each can be divided into four smaller ones. Denmark, in 1851, tried small square stamps of the size of those we are now using, and has since rejected them in favor of longer rectangles.

Various processes are employed in their production. Of steel engraving those of the United States have always been the best specimens. The French stamps are admirably lithographed, some of the details of manufacture being kept secret. There are nations whose stamps are merely type printing; a Turkish Principality uses a woodcut; the lettering on those of one of the Roman States must have been dabbed on, with a handstamp. There is stained paper, and bronzed and silvered monstrosities, like the "metallic ring" wherewith our fractions of a dollar used to be afflicted. It would also appear that the human mind has been strongly impressed in different countries with a belief that a stamp ought to have a raised or embossed surface; although, when the stamps are used, the embossing flattens out and the raised designs become impenetrable. All English stamps are on paper watermarked with a coronet, which is practically invisible, being covered with engraving, somewhat as the Irish gentleman wished to be portrayed in a landscape, just behind a tree. The stamps of Schleswig-Holstein had a silk thread run through them, before the Duchy itself was run through by the needle-gun.

There have been some hundreds of attempted substitutes for and proposed improvements upon postage stamps, more ingenious than valuable. A thing which is to be spit upon before it is sent to an esteemed friend can scarcely be called an elegant invention, but it seems to be a civilized necessity. Many contrivances have been tried to produce stamps that cannot be used after cancelation, or that do not need it. The small nutmeg-grater which is now impressed on the backs of United States stamps has some recondite relation to this purpose.

There is little to admire among the designs of postage stamps. The bust of a sovereign suffers less by the changes of fashion than his kitless portrait in the costume of the period; that of LEOPOLD of Belgium, might have been a caricature from the pencil of GILRAY. National emblems seem appropriate, where they do not affect the devices of heraldry. The messenger of gods and tutelar divinity of thieves, with winged helmet, caduceus and purse, represents Wirtemberg; one issued a sort of diminutive lazaretto; and Brazil used to print a kind of spider-web, with struggling numerals imprisoned in their meshes.

Stamps are sometimes put to strange uses. There are some issued in the German States, to be affixed to the Post Office, indicating not the amount of postage paid, but that to be paid by the recipient of the letter. It is barely possible that this is all the same in Dulcie. Our own postage stamps deserve a place in history as the forerunners of legal tender; the little cloud that ultimately rained greenbacks. In the early days of the war, when our silver change went over the border and disgusted the Canadians, the public took to the use of stamps for currency. Shall we ever forget those that were passed about in envelopes, integrably stuck together? How frequently, after trying all other methods of disposal, did we make a virtue of necessity, and drop them into the contribution plate! The Post Office authorities, equally annoyed by the use of dirty stamps, had a new kind issued, containing many postal devices, exchangeable for postage stamps, and entitled "postage currency." The new issue was merely intended to relieve temporary inconvenience; it became the entering wedge of a national circulating medium.

Until the present time, ours were among the handsomest postage stamps in the world. Exception might have been taken to their want of uniformity in design, and the heads on some of them were disproportionate, but taken singly they were excellent. Among the few that bore comparison with them were those of Russia. The latter seem to be lithographs, containing each only two colors, so ingeniously arranged as to appear like the product of four printings. The 30-kopek stamp, for instance, has a faint pink ground, solid pink interior and extensive borders, and a solid green color in an oval centre, while a coat-of-arms and an inscription stand out in pure white relief from the solid colors. Some of these brilliant effects, it would seem, are peculiar to lithography. Could we not have a new stamp, in which the peculiar excellencies of both lithographic and steel engraving might be combined? Is there anything to prevent the employment of both processes upon the same paper, and the production, thereby, of a postage stamp of rich color and artistic finish? We want the best thing of the sort that is in any way possible.

Buildings Made to Burn.

The other evening Baldwin's Hotel at Lake Mahopac, consisting of four large wooden houses, was burned to the ground. Early in July Thompson's Hotel, at the same place, situated on the southern part of the lake, also a wooden structure, was burned in a few hours in open day and while filled with guests. The burning of the hotel at Cape May was so recent as to be still remembered, although this may not be the case as to the many others which, after escaping fire, have defied all efforts to prevent their total destruction.

It happened singularly that both THOMPSON's and BALDWIN's, at the Lake, were burned while their respective owners were in the city. Mr. THOMPSON received information of his loss as he reached Croton Falls village, and Mr. BALDWIN reached the Lake on his return from the city to see his buildings wrapped in flames. There is no suspicion in either case that the burning was not accidental, and both will probably be rebuilt of wood. THOMPSON's is in fact now in process of building.

The erection of hotels at important watering places is a matter of such public concern—involving, as it does, the safety of numerous guests—that public sentiment ought to require the security which will result from solidity in their construction. If either accident had happened at night, serious loss of life might have been the result. The fire at THOMPSON's was supposed to have arisen from an over-heated or defective flue from the kitchen fire. BALDWIN's, we are told, caught fire from the carelessness of one of the domestics with a lamp. There were but few persons in the building, and no adequate means of putting out the fire after it had obtained a little head way.

The temptation to build hotels outside of large cities, with wood, arises from its supposed economy, but, considering the loss occasioned by fire, it would be more economical to build of stone, especially in a region which abounds in fine quarries, such as are worked near Lake Mahopac, or of brick, which may be made in almost all localities.

The objection urged against constructing the interior walls of a large hotel with brick is this, that immense parlors and dining rooms are required on the main floor, and that it would be impossible to use brick above for bedrooms, except their walls were supported with iron beams placed over the ceiling of the large rooms, and that the expense would be too severe. But as ground is not expensive at these watering places, the sleeping rooms might be constructed conveniently in a separate wing, and on a plan which would permit the walls to be built of brick from the foundation to the roof, so that if variation in size were required, the most important in dimensions would be above each other. On this plan, the staircases being of iron, and some attention being given to the floors of halls so as to prevent ready combustion, the structure would be sufficiently fire-proof for all practical purposes, and particularly if the roof were of slate or metal.

In all country houses of stone or brick, standing detached, the outside wall should be double to prevent dampness. The interior wall is not required to be more than one brick in thickness, as it contains no weight and may occasionally be tied by a copper or iron fastening, made to droop toward the outside wall, so as not to convey any drip from it, or a brick soaked in asphaltum may be used in the same manner.

The difficulty in putting out fires arises mainly from the use of lath and plaster, the lath being fastened to studding or furring, and thus furnishing a flue behind the plastering, in which the fire moves rapidly and invisibly in its work of destruction.

When the interior walls are of brick the plaster is laid directly upon them, and as frequently only two coats are required as against three when applied to lath, the difference in expense is proportionately inconsiderable. In view of the difference in the cost of subsequent repairs, also, the brick wall is much the more economical; but as the one is safe and the other highly dangerous, lath and plaster for the side-walls of rooms should be universally condemned.

All new countries are tempted, by the want of capital, to build houses of the cheapest first cost. This necessity, originally imposed upon our people, has grown into such a habit that we are still governed by it, although not pressed by the same pecuniary difficulty. Carpenters are more numerous in country towns than bricklayers, and if the structure be of wood, much of the work is done by laborers, who can use the ax and plane, and by the farmers themselves and their boys. The opinion is also quite prevalent that houses of wood are healthier, being dry, than those of stone. But it is well known that stone houses, with double walls, are dry at all seasons, and cooler in Summer and warmer in Winter than any others.

The tendency to build houses subject to total destruction by fire is encouraged by persons engaged in the work—carpenters, masons and architects—and our Insurance Companies exhibit a singular want of earnestness and skill or they would adopt such general rules applicable to the business of Insurance as would make it the interest of owners to use as little wood as possible and erect buildings of a solid and safe character capable of benefiting not only ourselves but the generations to succeed.

Income of the newspaper accounts of the damage caused by the recent flood, we were surprised to see the announcement that the shores of the Hudson River for thirty miles were "strewn with lumber, pumps, apples, stoves and hogsheads. Since the time of the wind storm which was so powerful as to carry away a sand bank, and leave the swallow's holes sticking out a foot or so, we had heard of nothing so remarkable as a rainstorm which had, over a large section of the country, carried away the pumps, and when to that was added the apparent discrimination against stores, in favor of other buildings, it was no wonder that the flood should be described as "totally unprecedented." A closer inspection, however, showed us that instead of an unprecedented meteorological phenomenon, we had before us only an instance of the work of that imp who is the pest of printing houses, and who had made the types read "pumps and stores," instead of "pumpkins and staves."

The supply of Croton in the reservoir has happily increased to such an extent, during the past few days, that we may now safely dispel all fears of a water-famine. This is due, of course, to the recent heavy rains. The public is informed, consequently, that the Croton Board, in view of the increased supply, has rescinded its order against sprinkling the streets with Croton water, and we shall therefore be relieved of much of the unpleasantness of dusty streets. Still it would be a great deal better if the dirt were removed, and if permanent utilization of the river water be effected, as it might be, there need be no further trouble from the failure of Croton.

We notice that another man has come forward with a lock which he is anxious to have submitted to a thorough test in order to prove that it cannot be picked by the most expert burglar. It is time the public should understand that there is not, and cannot, be such a thing as a burglar-proof lock. The modern marauder has certainly proven often enough that, given opportunity, he can force his way anywhere. True, he may not pick the lock, but if by use of the jack-screw or other means he demolishes the strong box and carries away the valuables, we presume the purpose of the lock is defeated, and that, practically, it has been proven that it is not burglar-proof. There is but one way to be certainly insured against loss at the hands of our enterprising outlaws—that is, to have nothing worth stealing.

We congratulate Philadelphia upon the possession of a sensible Judge. One of the persons implicated in the attempted assassination of Revenue Officer BABCOCK, being brought before him on habeas corpus, was asked if he had himself applied for the issuing of the process, and, upon a negative reply being given, the writ was dismissed, and the prisoner remanded. If all Judges would pursue a similar course, the writ of habeas corpus would be less liable to abuse, speculative attorneys being more frequently foiled, and the best interests of society conserved in the same ratio. If, by any means, a stop can be put to the gratuitous commencement of proceedings in habeas corpus, the abuse of the process will be to some extent decreased without infringing in the least upon its legitimate use.

In winding up the Albert Insurance Company, the Vice-Chancellor restricts the costs of receivership and other legal expenses, and declares that "a public company is not to be considered as a carcass to be preyed upon." Such a doctrine in this country would, we presume, be regarded with horror—as trenching on one of the dearest rights and prerogatives of the legal fraternity. But it might, perhaps, stop litigation, by making the "fat pickings" of a corporation less coveted than they are now.

As passage across the lower end of the City Hall Park is now forever stopped, our City authorities would add to the convenience of many thousands every day if they would facilitate crossing from Park-row to Broadway by such means as still remain. For instance, openings might, with propriety, be made in the railings, and paths cut thereon and graveled; and the beaten and muddy track outside of the north end of the Post Office contractor's fence might be improved and furnished with an additional lamp or two. These easy improvements are all the more called for in view of the long period which must elapse before the new building can be finished.

Even if they should ever remove the national capital to the Missouri or Mississippi, Washington need not be dejected. They cannot take away the Potomac nor the beautiful and promising vineyards now spreading over the hills around the city, for instance, at Kendal Green, on the Maryland side, and Rock Creek, and especially on the heights of the Virginia shore. The Washington Star gives a very encouraging account of the new grape culture carried on by a number of gentlemen, especially by Mr. PHILLIPS, who having began a few years ago on the last-mentioned locality, is now enabled to surprise the community by the size and flavor of his grape-clusters. The "Potomac Fruit Growers' Association," which has resulted from these experiments, will no doubt make Washington another Cincinnati—to say nothing of Johannisberg or Monte pulciano.

The Ladies' Junta, like the Cuban Junta, manager to try conclusions with the powers of despotism; and Mrs. NORTON is the Goddess of the grand liberating enterprise. She would also join issue with impartiality on the general election of the State, regardless of consequences. But there are dangers ahead. In the one case, there is the American vessel-of-war just now in the harbor of Havana—to say nothing of the gunboats—and in the other the "dread laugh" of Mr. GREELEY, so suggested so opportunely by Mrs. STANTON. That last consideration very naturally terrified the ladies into a rejection of the Norton strategy. They will begin to study the law-books instead, probably.

The poor Mormons are a good deal exercised just now by the Gentile influences about them, and all the innovations and moving incidents of the time. After that whirlwind rush of the Pacific Railroad came the earthquake; and after this came the still small voice of Vice-President COLFAX, demonstrating from the Book of Mormon that polygamy is not a divine institution, but an after thought. All those things are against BRIGHAM. We are informed by the telegraph that two or three hundred Mormons have been sent into Europe to recruit; but we strongly suspect that they are deserters and not missionaries, and don't mean to go back or send any one back. They might have borne with many things—even the penury of a single wife—but the earthquake was probably too much for them. The Book of Mormon gives no insurance or assurance against earthquakes.

Things are not so bad as they seem. We are not going to be entirely overrun by the Mongolians very probably. The San Francisco Bulletin gives us, from the statistical returns of that port, the assurance that the influx is not at all alarming—that while, from 1858 to 1863, it amounted to about 8,000 yearly, it numbered from 1864 to 1868 about 3,000 per annum. If the departures be taken as a set off, the addition to our population would be found very inconsiderable. The Bulletin thinks that if the Chinese were left to themselves in the matter, there would be no inconvenience from that immigration. Indeed, it is not hard to see that anything dangerous in it would result from the supplying of the Chinese labor of the market by Mr. COOPMANSHAP, or any other men of that stamp among the thrifty Celestials.

As the chilly nights come on, the veterans of the army of Station House lodgers reappear, and with them this year have come many new recruits. These outcasts, constantly increasing in number, and yearly becoming more abject and useless, present a difficulty with which the authorities will soon be forced to grapple. These men and women cannot always be permitted to annoy the public by pertinacious begging by day, and breed pestilence at night by crowding into the contracted lodging rooms of the Station Houses. It has been sufficiently demonstrated that these people will not work except upon compulsion, and the City will, in the end, be forced to provide some refuge where they will be not only innocuous, but where their labor can be rendered productive.

The Perilous Voyage of the Steamer New-York.

From the Boston Advertiser, Oct. 9.

A passenger has communicated to us the following account of the escape of the steamer New-York, of the International Line, under perilous circumstances, on her trip from St. John to Boston in the late storm:

"The voyage as far as Eastport was pleasant as usual. The wind, which had been blowing freshly from the S. E. all the forenoon, gradually increased, so that by 3 o'clock P. M., when the boat was ready to start, it was deemed imprudent to continue the voyage. The direction of the wind and its increasing violence rendered it unsafe for the vessel to remain at the wharf, and Captain E. B. WHORMSBY sought shelter and safety for his ship in a land-locked cove, a course the wisdom of which was fully demonstrated by succeeding events, as the wharves and vessels lying in the docks at Eastport were nearly all destroyed.

"We steamed into 'Rumery's Bay,' and having the high land of Lubec between us and the wind, cast anchor at 4 P. M., under the land, less than half a league off. A number of coasters, loaded with lumber, had also sought shelter there. It seemed impossible but that with the land so near and so high between us and the gale we should be able to ride it out in safety. But how little did we know of the strength and violence of the elements! The gale kept steadily increasing, with darkness and rain, till 7½, when the burthen deck was started up from its fastenings for half its length on one side, the roof and sides of the main saloon on the main deck swaying and bending like pasteboard. Thinking it best to unrest the state rooms and saloon cabin, where were at least a hundred passengers, who, in that event, would have been instantly swept into the sea. The scene presented was awful. Strong men turned pale; children and women screamed; some knelt in prayer. Officers of the boat were then ordered to the state rooms. It is the unanimous opinion, so far as I have been able to gather it, that had our anchorage held, the ship would have survived but a few moments longer. She must, to all appearance, have been torn to pieces, so far as her upper works were concerned, by the fury of the tempest. Providentially, in answer to prayer, no doubt—she parted both her chain cables and lost both her anchors, the larger of which had held her in Passamaquoddy Sound, in the gale during the war when all else about her went down or ashore. We then, under our reefed sails, yielded to the wind which she could not otherwise have withstood. We then were in the land of God alone, drifting like a feather before that wild tempest. He guided us, for when we struck the lee shore it was upon mud bottom, in a sheltered cove, where we lay for near an hour, while the tempest was spending its fury. We went on a little before high water of the highest tide known for years; and after being tied to the trees awhile, it was found to be necessary, in order to save the ship, to cut her off from the shore, as by some means, known to better sailors than myself, she was got off of that lee shore in such a gale. But to the consternation of Captain and crew, it was found, when we went out to sea again, that the rudder was unmanageable, the pintles, part having been broken clean off, as was afterward found, against the shore or some reef while drifting to it. And here we were at sea in a bay full of islands, reefs and jutting points, on a moonless night, without rudder or anchor, and the gale still blowing furiously upon us, though abated from its height. Now we were then saved who can tell? Was it not through more than human skill? By steaming first one way and then the other, as approach to rocks or land made it necessary, the winds and currents favoring, we were drifted back to Eastport and into the very wharf we had left nine hours before, as handsomely as though it had been a calm day and all the ship's gear perfect.

"Strong resolutions of approval and admiration of the admirable skill and conduct of the Captain and crew were passed by the grateful and happy passengers, and Rev. A. McKOWN, of Boston, Commander, was called on to offer a prayer of thanksgiving to God for the great deliverance."

Perils of a Lighthouse Keeper.

Mr. THOMAS EARLE, the keeper of the beacon light, at this port, did not like the looks of things at about 6 P. M., on Monday. The wind was blowing from the S. W., carrying the waves with great force over the lighthouse. He determined to leave it and go ashore over the bar. He made the attempt but the tide was too high, and he had to retrace his steps. As the storm proceeded, the tower was carried away, the bell borne overboard, the window glass and globes broken. The lower part of the lighthouse was filled with water. The sea broke over the upper part of it, but Mr. EARLE closed the hatchway to keep the water from coming down upon him in the centre part. But the lamp having lost its glass covering, set the frames being still burning, burned by the heated air, the woodwork, and threatened to add the sublime element of a conflagration to the terrors of the winds and waves. Mr. EARLE, however, managed to put an extinction globe over the lamp, to extinguish the fire, and to seize hold of the swinging ladders, both his hands being thus occupied, and so to remain from 1 to 4 o'clock in the morning, when he sought the shore! He passed a most miserable night and morning in the lighthouse, passed through peals of wind and water and fire that might appal the strongest heart, and has no faith in wooden lighthouses completely shaken.

TELEGRAMS.

TERRIFIC HURRICANE AT EASTPORT, ME.

Great Destruction of Property and Life.

Honors to the Late Ex-President Pierce.

SERIOUS ILLNESS OF ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

Disastrous Fire at Rochester University.

THE STORM IN MAINE.

Fearful Hurricane at Eastport—The Town in Ruins—Terrible Loss of Life—A Large Number of Vessels Wrecked—The Swift River Wrecked—Immense Destruction of Property.

EASTPORT, Me., Oct. 5, via BANGOR, Me., Oct. 9.—This town was visited by a fearful hurricane last night, vessels, wharves, stores and fishhouses were smashed to atoms. Great quantities of fish and oil were destroyed.

The steamer New-York narrowly escaped loss with all on board. She was driven ashore and lost both anchors and her rudder. Many of the merchants here have lost all their property. The heaviest losers are J. & S. Griffin, $10,000; E. W. French, $6,000 and J. & S. Pearce. J. & S. Griffin lost their vessels, fish and storehouses. Mr. Pearce lost his store and all the stock. E. W. French had vessels wrecked and stores and wharves washed away. Most of the fishing vessels are in pieces.

EASTPORT, Oct. 6, via BANGOR, Oct. 9.—Twenty-seven vessels are ashore in Rumney's Bay. The schooners Bimp and Percy were badly damaged. The schooner Rio was lost in St. Andrew's Bay, with all on board. A bark, at New River, was lost with all on board—seventeen in number. Grand Menan is swept, with all the wiers and smokehouses. The towns of Lubec, Pembroke and Percy lose heavily. Houses and barns were blown down.

This tornado is worse for Eastport than the great fire. The vessels ashore are the Sarah, Conway, Empress, Ward, Baldon, Burns, Bob, Starlight, Belle, M. J. Langhton, Speedwell, Debonaire, Margie, Willie, Move, and others. The Conway, Speedwell, Commodore, and some others, are complete wrecks. The revenue cutter Moosewood was disabled at the beginning of the storm, and could render no assistance. All the smokehouses are down, and the smoked herring and oil are lost. The loss cannot be less than $600,000. A large part of the town is a perfect wreck.

LEWISTON, Me., Oct. 9.—The Evening Journal has a report of a great freshet on Swift River, in Oxford County, showing a rise of thirty-six feet in twelve hours in that stream, which is a tributary of the Androscoggin. The improvements of the Lewiston Steam Mill Company, for lumbering operations, were destroyed, and their large dam swept away. Scores of inter-vale farms were covered several feet deep with sand. Numerous houses and barns were demolished. The people barely escaped with their lives, and with the children in their arms, to the mountains. The farmers living on the river are impoverished and homeless.

EX-PRESIDENT PIERCE.

Respect to his Memory—Action in the Various Departments at Washington.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9.—The following orders have been issued:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, Oct. 9, 1869.

Pursuant to the order of the President, this Department will be closed on Monday, the 11th inst., as a mark of respect to the memory of Ex-President PIERCE.

(Signed) HAMILTON FISH.

In obedience to an order by the President, as a mark of respect to the memory of Ex-President FRANKLIN PIERCE, deceased, this Department will be draped in mourning for a period of thirty days, and its several bureaus, offices and Custom Houses throughout the United States will be closed on Monday, the 11th inst., the day on which the obsequies of the deceased will be solemnized. The public works under the control of this Department will also be suspended, and the flags kept at half-mast on that day.

(Signed) J. F. HARTLEY,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 9, 1869.

GENERAL ORDERS NO. 68.—In compliance with the instructions of the President and the Secretary of War, on the day after the receipt of the order at each military post, the troops will be paraded at 10 o'clock A. M. and the order read to them, after which all the labors of the day will cease. The national flag will be displayed at half-staff at dawn of day, thirteen guns fired, and afterward, at intervals of thirty minutes between the rising and setting of the sun, a single gun; at the close of day a national salute of thirty-seven guns. The officers of the army will wear crape on the left arm and on their swords, and the colors of the several regiments will be put in mourning for the period of thirty days.

By command of General SHERMAN,
J. C. KELTON, Assistant-Adjutant General.

In pursuance of the order of the President, it is hereby directed that twenty-one guns be fired at intervals of one minute each at the several navy yards and stations on the day when this order may be received in time; otherwise on the day after its receipt; commencing at noon; and also on board the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

The flags of the several navy yards, naval stations, marine barracks and vessels in commission will be placed at half-mast from sunrise to sunset on the day when the minute guns are fired.

All officers of the navy and marine corps will wear the usual badge of mourning attached to the sword hilt and on the left arm for twenty days.

By order of GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

His Serious Illness at Chicago—It is Feared he Cannot Recover.

CHICAGO, Oct. 9.—Admiral FARRAGUT has been in this city several days lying dangerously ill at the Sherman House. He took cold during an excursion on the Lake, which has resulted in congestive chills, and grave apprehensions are felt for his recovery.

ROCHESTER UNIVERSITY.

Disastrous Fire—Valuable Cabinets Destroyed—The Loss Heavy.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Oct. 9.—This evening the large frame building in the rear of the University of Rochester, containing the laboratory, workshops, and the private mineralogical, zoological and other cabinets of Prof. HENRY WARD, and his plaster casts, moulds and models, were destroyed by fire. Most, if not all, of the zoological cabinet was saved comparatively uninjured. The mineralogical cabinet was burned. The value of the whole is estimated at about $60,000. The insurance is between $25,000 and $40,000. The large cabinets sold by the Professor to the University are safe in the University. The fire has destroyed the labor of years, and articles that cannot be replaced. The fire is supposed to have originated accidentally.

Disaster on Lake Michigan—Loss of a Canadian Vessel—Four Persons Drowned.

MILWAUKEE, Oct. 9.—Intelligence from the Eastern Shore reports the Canada vessel Kate Bulley water-logged and capsized. The Captain and first mate KENNEDY, Ed. CORBET and MERRILL BAILEY were lost, the balance of the crew were picked up by the Black Hawk and saved.

Return of Jefferson Davis from England.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 9.—JEFFERSON DAVIS arrived here this afternoon by the steamship Baltimore from Southampton.

The Removal of the National Capital—The Coming Convention in St. Louis—Arrival of Land Speculators in Omaha.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Oct. 9.—The National Capital Executive Committee have received assurances that the several Congressional districts of Indiana and Kentucky, in consequence of the action of the Commissioners of those States in appoint delegates, have taken the matter in hand, and will appoint their quota of delegates to represent them in the Convention to be held in St. Louis on the 20th inst.

A number of capitalists from the East arrived at Omaha yesterday, with the view of investing in Omaha and in the Northwestern Railroad, a part of which they intend building this year.

Sinking of a Steamer on the Delaware River—Vermont Hence of the Passengers.

PHILADELPHIA, Penn., Oct. 9.—The steamer S. Z. Poles, belonging to the Wilmington and Baltimore Railway Company, ran on a rock in Quaker pier during a dense fog on the Delaware River, while coming into the dock at Claymont. The passengers were transferred to the steamer Honeck, and continued their trip to the city. No one was injured or lost. The Poles is in shore, in a few feet of water, and not lower down than when floating.

INDIAN MATTERS.

Reports from General Sherman and Author—Affairs in Dakota—More Troops Asked for—Encouragement Among the Ogallalahs.

CHICAGO, Ill., Oct. 9.—The latest reports from General DURGAN, on the Republican River, confirm the previous reports of his success against the Indians. The quantity of valuable material captured is much greater than at first reported. General ANSON arrived at Cheyenne from Fort Fetterman on the 4th inst. He is accompanied by five of the most influential chiefs of the Northern Arapahoes, who have come to consult Governor CAMPBELL in reference to a meeting of the Snakes, Shoshones and other friendly tribes, with whom they desire a treaty to protect themselves against the Southern Sioux and Cheyennes. The latter are very hostile, and threaten the Arapahoes with annihilation.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 9.—Governor BURBANK, of Dakota, Ex-Officio Superintendent of Indian Affairs for that Territory, has forwarded to the Bureau of Indian Affairs copies of letters from First Lieutenant WOODSON, of the Commissary, and Captain D. C. POOLE, Indian Agent at the Whetstone Agency in that Territory, with reference to the present and anticipated troubles among the Indians there, and asking that troops be stationed there. Lieutenant WOODSON reports that the subsistence stores at the agency are in a great state of insecurity. The recent disturbances among the Indians, occasioned by the introduction of whisky, has resulted in the destruction of public property. A disposition is manifested on their part to kill the beef cattle sent there for their use. Frequent instances have occurred already. A request is made for a sufficient number of troops to insure the necessary safety to the public property and the lives of the employes.

Captain POOLE reports that the Ogallallahs and Brulas under his charge are smarting under their defeat by General CARR and his Pawnee scouts in July last, and are being constantly incited by less friendly Indians, with whom they are in daily communication, to revenge the death of their fallen comrades. They have organized a war party against the Pawnees, and have visited near their Reservation and taken some scalps. The Pawnees, in return, lately visited the Whetstone Agency and stole a number of horses.

An Offer of Volunteers from the Governor of Arizona.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 8.—Late Arizona advices have been received. Governor SAFFORD has offered General THOMAS 200 volunteers, all of whom are old Indian fighters, for a six months' campaign; the Governor to furnish them with rations and ammunition.

THE PACIFIC COAST.

The Chinese and the Fourteenth Amendment—Large Fire in San Francisco—Prominent Arrivals in That City—Mineral Discoveries in Nevada—A Riot and Death of an Army Officer in Arizona.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Oct. 8.—Judge SAWYER, of the District Court, has decided that Chinese testimony is admissible against white men, under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution.

A fire occurred last night on Sacramento-street, below Front-street, which destroyed property to the amount of $80,000.

A large excursion party, including Governor WARD, of New-Jersey; Colonel ORDWAY, of Washington City, and Hon. CHARLES KNAPP, of New-York, arrived here to-day. Resolutions were adopted by the party complimenting the Chicago and Northwestern, Union, Central and Western Pacific Railroads. The party assert that the latter road is fully equal to the eastern roads.

The Daily Herald has suspended publication.

Important mineral discoveries have been made in the State of Nevada, fifteen miles south of Carlin Station, on the Central Pacific Railroad.

Late Arizona advices state that a riot occurred at Prescott on the 20th of September. Three soldiers were killed and one wounded.

Major McCOMBAS, of the United States Army, was recently accidentally killed at Junction.

Movements of Vice-President Colfax and Party.

CHICAGO, Ill., Oct. 9.—Vice President COLFAX is in Cheyenne, where he will remain for a few days, on account of the illness of his mother. The rest of the party, except Governor BROSS and family, continued the trip eastward.

PRINCE ARTHUR.

His Arrival in Montreal—A Grand Reception—He is to Visit the United States in the Spring.

MONTREAL, Oct. 8.—The Prince left Kingston at 11 o'clock A. M. yesterday. An immense crowd on the wharf attended the departure. The steamer Bay of Quinte, filled with excursionists, accompanied the Prince to Gananoque. At Brockville a large crowd gathered and an address was presented to the Prince. He reached Prescott at 5 o'clock P. M. The Governor-General and party left for Ottawa amidst great enthusiasm. The host remained over night at Brannar's wharf, and left at 9 o'clock this morning, stopping at Cornwall, where a band and a guard of honor were in waiting, with a crowd of persons. The day was very fine. Baptiste, an Indian pilot, came off from Caughnawaga with two canoes, twenty men in each, singing. The Prince reached Montreal at 2 o'clock P. M., where 15,000 persons were assembled on the wharf. Mayor WORKMAN presented an address, and the Prince returned his thanks. He then drove to Rosemount. Crowds of persons lined the streets and filled the windows. The arches over the streets were very elegant and imposing. The Prince lunched with the Mayor. The Queen, J. G. BENNETT and HORACE GREELEY were toasted. In the evening there was an illumination. The Prince will go to Ottawa on Monday, to remain for ten days. He will then return to duty at Montreal. The Prince will visit the United States in May, unless there is a change in the present plans.

THE COMMERCIAL CONVENTION.

Arrival of Delegates at Louisville—The Lawrenceburg, Ind., Delegation.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Oct. 9.—Delegates to the Commercial Convention are arriving by every train. Ex-President MILLARD FILLMORE and wife reached the city to-day.

LAWRENCEBURG, Ind., Oct. 9.—Mayor SWOPE has appointed J. E. Burkam, L. B. Lewis, E. B. Dobell, E. G. Hayes, A. A. Heifer, Gideon Rentner and John B. Gerster to represent the interests of this city at the Commercial Convention to be held at Louisville on Oct. 12.

BASE BALL.

Athletic and Keystone in Philadelphia—Syracuse vs. Oswego—A Game at the Latter City.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 9.—Seven innings of a match of base ball were played to-day by the Athletic and Keystone Clubs, which resulted: Athletic, 37; Keystone, 12.

OSWEGO, Oct. 9.—The game of base ball played at Oswego between the Central City, of Syracuse, and Oneida, of Oneida, was won by the Centrals by a score of 29 to 27.

The United Pacific Railroad—Earnings for September.

OMAHA, Neb., Oct. 9.—The earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad for the month of September were $145,709 96, an increase of $15,057 14 over the month of August.

POLITICAL.

Republican Senatorial Nominations in the Twentieth and Twenty-Second Districts, New-York.

ROCHESTER SPRINGS, N. Y., Oct. 9.—At the Republican Senatorial Convention of the Twentieth Senatorial District, held here to-day, AUGUSTUS R. ELWOOD, of this village, was unanimously nominated for Senator.

POUGHKEEPSIE JUNCTION, Oct. 9.—Hon. ABRAM X. PARKER was to-day unanimously renominated for the State Senate by the Republicans of this (the Seventeenth) District, composed of St. Lawrence and Franklin Counties.

Senator Bolger Renominated in the Twenty-sixth District—Assembly Nominations in Niagara County.

GENEVA, N. Y., Oct. 9.—At the Twenty-sixth District Convention, held here to-day, CHARLES J. BOLGER was renominated for Senator for the fifth term.

LOCKPORT, N. Y., Oct. 9.—At the Democratic Convention of the First Assembly District of Niagara County, held in this city to-day, Colonel LEWIS B. PATTEN was nominated as the Democratic candidate for member of the Assembly, to succeed RANSOM M. SEXERLE.

Saratoga County Democratic Convention—The Ticket Nominated.

SARATOGA, N. Y., Oct. 9.—The Democrats have nominated THOS. G. YOUNG for County Clerk, CHAS. H. HUBLBURT for County Treasurer, CHAS. F. MOTT for Superintendent of the Poor, ISAIAH FULLER for Member of the Assembly from the First District.

Republican Assembly Nomination in Madison County.

ONEIDA, N. Y., Oct. 9.—Hon. LEONARD C. KILHAM was to-day renominated for the Assembly by acclamation, by the Republicans of the Second District of Madison County.

THE STAGE.

The Week's Amusements.

There has been rather a dearth of novelty at the City theatres during the past week, but as this is commonly the sign of prosperity and public satisfaction, we presume that neither managers nor audiences have anything of which to complain. The weather has been very favorable for the drama, as well as for the races, and numerous gatherings have been the rule wherever tolerable amusement has been offered.

Mlle. CARLOTTA PATTI has steadily maintained the enthusiasm of her audiences at the high point achieved on her first appearance, and the delight and wonder elicited by her superb execution show no abatement. The Brooklyn concerts have been as successful as those of New-York, and there is not the least doubt that Mlle. PATTI's career through the country will be a series of triumphs. The matinée yesterday was thronged to discomfort, and it has been found expedient to give an extra concert, which is accordingly announced for to-morrow night. There will also be one additional concert in Brooklyn on Tuesday.

Mrs. SCOTT-SIDDONS has confirmed the favorable impression recorded in these columns last Tuesday by crowding the Fifth-avenue Theatre nightly in "Twelfth Night." Her Viola has improved with repetition, and she will ultimately play the character with much finish and elegance. That there are certain faults of inexperience in her impersonation may be freely admitted; but there is a freshness and an air of delicacy and breeding about Mrs. SCOTT-SIDDONS' acting which make it infinitely more agreeable to a refined taste than the efforts of many artists of longer training and of greater conventional skill. Mr. DALY has striven hard to make the season at his pretty theatre a remunerative one, and we are glad to be able to anticipate his success. Mrs. SCOTT-SIDDONS is understood to appear here in Rosalind, but the management will be wise to let "Twelfth Night" run as long as it will.

We have only to repeat the record of last week concerning Miss BATEMAN's great attractiveness in "Leah." Booth's Theatre has been filled every night by audiences who have repeatedly been warmed to enthusiasm, and there are no indications of diminution either in numbers or admiration. Miss BATEMAN's original engagement was for but four weeks, but we imagine a reengagement will be almost a peremptory necessity. It will not answer for this excellent young artist to depart without letting the New-York public see her in other rôles which she has made almost distinctively her own as she has that of "Leah;" and it is to be hoped that arrangements will be made to prevent such a calamity. Mr. ARTHUR MATHISON's creditable dramatization of "Enoch Arden" has been well played at this theatre on the two last Saturday nights, to the satisfaction of those who have witnessed it, who speak very favorably of the literary merits of the adapter.

At Wallack's "Progress," which, in despite of the sinister comments of the Saturday Review, and of the imputed claims of M. VICTORIEN SARDOU, we persist in thinking one of Mr. ROBERTSON's ablest efforts, has continued to please intelligent audiences, and will be repeated at intervals during the season. Of plot, as we have before said, this comedy has very little. Its merit is almost solely in the dialogue and situations. And as the latter are slight enough, the dialogue is substantially the interest of the piece. Now, this dialogue is about as much like the dialogue of Les Ganaches as the dialogue of ALEXANDER DUMAS is like that of THACKERAY; and, therefore, the attempt to deprive Mr. ROBERTSON of credit on the score of his "adapting" SARDOU is, in this regard, simply ridiculous. "An Unequal Match" is to be acted at Wallack's to-morrow night, and "Caste" on Tuesday.

At the Academy of Music two very respectable performances on Friday of "Robert le Diable," and on Saturday of "Lucia di Lammermoor," have been given by the French Opera Company for their own benefit, and we are happy to say not without tangible results. The company includes several meritorious artists, and although the manager doubtless committed the error of underestimating the calibre of the operatic talent to which New-York has of late years been accustomed, this was hardly the fault of the singers, who have done their utmost to please, and have been placed by the failure of the enterprise in a humiliating and distressing situation. We shall rejoice to know that they have been comfortably extricated from their difficulties, and are able to look forward to a more promising future.

Concerning the other theatres very little need be said. The drama of "The Streets of New-York" has been extremely well received at the Olympic, and will continue this week, in the enjoyment of a prosperous run. "Fortunio," which was played all last week at Niblo's, is to be acted for the last time on Saturday next, Miss LUCILLE WESTON appearing in "East Lynne" for six nights, commencing on the following Monday. The French Theatre will be opened to-morrow evening, when "Sam" will be rendered by Mr. F. S. CHANFRAU and a very strong company. The New-York Circus will be opened for the season to-morrow also. Musically, this week will not be notable. On Saturday, however, an interesting concert will be given by the directors and attachés of the American Conservatory of Music, at Irving Hall. The orbates are: MISS LOUISA ORLOW, the favorite concert singer; MOSS. F. SARSON, the celebrated lyric baritone, from Sweden, (his first début in America;) Mr. MARK S. PINNER, pianist; Herr CARL FERNBOMB, violinist; Herr HUGO BOMMERES, pianist; Herr CARL ALVES, tenor, and the well-known HESS children. The proceeds of the concert will accrue to the Avendale fund.

Foreign Gossip.

WAGNER'S NEW OPERA.

Mr. H. F. CHORLEY, an English musical critic of good repute, prints in the latest issue of the Athenæum an answer to a definite of RICHARD WAGNER (whose new opera, "Das Rheingold," has just achieved at Munich a succès d'estime only) by a Mr. WALTER BACHE. Last week's Athenæum, says Mr. CHORLEY, gave a new and amusing proof of the nature of the grounds on which such honest persons as bow the knee to Herr WAGNER claim homage for their uncouth and shapeless musical idol. The composer of "Das Rheingold" has, in Mr. WALTER BACHE, found a champion more earnest than original, more peremptory than powerful or prudent. Let us look into the reason of such championship. First, Mr. BACHE tells us, we "must consider a Wagner opera" as "a drama with musical declamation, a work consisting of music, poetry, scenery and action." Ere thus bidden "to eat the leek," old-fashioned students like myself, I submit, had already been instructed to consider that the above-cited four elements were indispensable to every opera, whether the same was classical in the observance of unities, or romantic in its appeals to the fancy. Possibly Mr. BACHE intended to say that no single element should predominate; that the scene-painter and the machinist should hold an equal place with that of the dramatist who devises the tale in poetry, of the musician who clothes it with all the garnitures of a beautiful art, subject to certain and definite laws, and that of the actors who exhibit the thoughts completed rather than nakedly expressed by the skill and science of the musician. All separation for the purpose of analysis of any of the elements aforesaid is thereby protested against by Mr. BACHE. A green cactus tree is thereby asserted to be as "worthy" (to quote old grammar) as a musical phrase—a thump on the drum as superb as any flash of genius on the part of a Pasta, a Lablache, a Malibran. Let such a fallacy pass, that we may come to a truism of its kind equally astounding. Mr. W. BACHE insists that no clear understanding of the Wagnerian shows can be arrived at without the admirer, or recusant, as may be, having been present at an efficient performance of them, or the study of some entire scene at a pianoforte recital, accompanied by the voice. "By this means," continues our enthusiast, "in the case of WAGNER, the mind must distinctly realise and retain a train of musical and poetical thought which has never before been expressed, which may occupy half an hour in its delivery, and which becomes more clear and definite after being actually heard than can possibly be the case after being merely imagined." It is certainly as well to know something about that which the hearer pretends to judge; but such an amazing concession does not help us to the solution of Mr. BACHE's difficulty. AUDREY's question, "Is it a true thing?" remains unanswered. Are we considering a stately edifice,

—a pleasure dome of rare device,
and composed of precious material, pointing upward to the skies? or some chaotic monster not meriting the name of a building, in which every accepted law and proportion are reversed or set aside, and in which, failing gold and marble and precious stones, we are bidden to accept, by way of novelty, such rubbish as great artificers of genius have cast aside by reason of its meanness and want of worth? No reiteration of flat and pompous truisms, I am convinced, will give grace, variety or originality to the inane and unmeaning phrases allotted to the singers in "Das Rheingold,"—dramatic interest or poetry to its awkward and scarcely intelligible legend, told in flat or outrageous language—nor practicability to scenic combinations ridiculous because impossible. Every condition that Mr. WALTER BACHE demands (including that of preliminary study of the pianoforte score) was complied with by many who attended the careful and excellent, and all but complete, presentment of "Das Rheingold" at its rehearsal. Of course, the impression of miserable weariness made on these by bad choice of the drama, by monotony and want of significance in ideas, worse arrangement of it for music, and an absurdity of scenery, is ascribed by Mr. BACHE to "preconceived prejudice," to "critical obstinacy and incompetence," and to a feeling embittered by Herr WAGNER's polemical habit of exalting himself by abusing his betters, (not forgetting his cant about Judaism.) But Mr. BACHE's assertions, unsupported by proof, will no more attract a public to the booth of a transcendental charlatan than my impressions will destroy that which deserves to thrive and live, even as the music of the great masters has thriven, and still lives on the opera stages of Germany, Italy, France and England. There may be fits of disease and bad taste; but that which is true and real is great, and, as the adage says, "will prevail."

SHERIDAN IN GERMANY.

The Berlin correspondent of the London Daily News writes to that journal that "the 'School for Scandal' has been adapted for the German stage under the name of 'Schleicher und Genossen,' or 'Sneak and Company,' by RUDOLF GENEE, and is now performing to full houses at the Royal Schauspielhaus. The taste of the public, both in England and Germany, was less fastidious in the latter half of the last century and the beginning of this than it is now, and the adapter has shown his judgment in omitting some of those equivocal jokes of the gossiping clique, which convulsed the diaphragms of our grandfathers and fathers, but which are received with less indulgence by a modern audience. For these, however, he has substituted other jokes of a more innocent nature, and some of them at least very good ones. The entire plot, a great part of the dialogue, and all the characters have been retained, and yet in a certain sense an exception must be made with regard to the latter, for SHERIDAN's Sir Peter Teazle, as played by FARREN, is wanting. It is true a certain Herr Balders and his wife are introduced in precisely similar circumstances and situations to those of Sir Peter and Lady Teazle—they have their matrimonial squabbles, and are engaged in similar intrigues; but the whole conception of Balders' part is so utterly different from the English conception of Sir Peter as known to English audiences that it is difficult for an Englishman to recognize any identity. Whereas, both the get-up and acting of Sir Peter's part are essentially humorous, and constitute one of the main attractions of the original play. Herr Balders is represented as a quiet, easy-day, estate gentleman, devoid of eccentricities, and his relations to his wife are treated with very little humor from beginning to end. In short, Sir Peter, transformed into Herr Balders, may be compared to that prodigal of all SHERIDAN's characters, Falkland, in the "Rivals," and though his weakness may occasionally excite a smile, it will never bredden into a laugh. I am quite at a loss to judge how far the faint line with the adapter or the actor; but, certainly, as now represented, "Schleicher und Genossen" is very much like the play of "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet omitted. The acting, generally speaking, is good, but not so effective as I remember to have seen it the original piece at the Haymarket."

The libretto is said to be by LEON PILLET. We quote the report without placing any faith in it.... Yet another opera on the subject of "Alessandro Stradella!" The latest setting is by Signor FRANCESCO GARSILLI, and has just been published at Naples.... The Theatre Argentina at Rome has given a performance of MEYERBEER's "Robert le Diable." The Roman censors, however, objected to the name of the great enemy of the human race being in the title, and so the opera was rechristened "Robert di Picardia."

CROTON AQUEDUCT BOARD.

Decision of the Court of Appeals—Thomas Stephens Declared to be the Rightful President of the Board.

The Court of Appeals has just rendered a decision in the case of the People of the State of New-York, on the relation of JOHN J. BRADLEY against THOMAS STEPHENS, which is of importance to the City of New-York. The relators commenced an action in the nature of quo warranto, to try the title to the office of President of the Croton Aqueduct Board. The relator, BRADLEY, was nominated on the 7th of December, 1866, by the Mayor of this City, to the Board of Aldermen for the office in question, in the place of the appellant, Mr. STEPHENS. The Board of Aldermen confirmed Mr. BRADLEY by a unanimous vote, and on the same day he took the oath of office, and entered the duties of President of the Croton Aqueduct Board. At the time of BRADLEY's appointment Mr. THOMAS STEPHENS was in possession of the office in question. He had been appointed to that office by the Mayor and Aldermen, on the 12th of April, 1866, for a term of five years. The Legislature of 1866, passed an act which, among other things, provided as follows:

SECTION 1. The terms of office of the several heads of departments of the Corporation of the City of New-York, holding office by appointment under the Mayor of the said City, shall hereafter be four years, and until their successors have been duly appointed and qualified. The several heads of departments of said Corporation, now in office, shall continue in office for four years from the date of the appointment of the present Assistant Commissioner of the Board, and until their successors shall have been duly appointed and qualified.

The four years of DARRAGH's appointment expired Dec. 8, 1866, and notwithstanding the appointment of the respondent, the appellant STEPHENS continued to exercise the powers of President of the Board.

The case has been before the Courts for some time, and until now the decision was in favor of the respondents, BRADLEY & Co. The Court of Appeals held the case in reserve, and at the last term they stood four to four. They have now decided to render judgment for the defendant, STEPHENS, who is the appellant in the case.

A Co-operative Colony for Kansas.

A meeting was held last evening at No. 214 Bowery to consider the plan of organizing a colony for settling in Kansas on the cooperative system. The advantages of the plan were set forth by one of the leaders in the movement, whose remarks were frequently applauded.

It was proposed that 100 persons move to Kansas, buy land at the rate of $15 per 160 acres, and build up a town.

The printed circular of the parties interested, says: "We shall, on the cooperative principle, buy our oxen, plows, cows, pigs, &c., by wholesale, and put the middleman's profits in our own pockets. In this way we can buy our provisions, while waiting for our lands to produce crops. All this, and building a house, will not cost more than $300."

This is the first of a series of meetings to further the plan, and in due time an effort will be made to put it into practical working.

A New Discovery!
PHALON'S VITALIA.
OR SALVATION FOR THE HAIR.
For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.
PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers" and "restorers" (!) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or discolored matter, requires no shaking up and communicates no stain to the skin. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, a new discovery in toilet chemistry.
PHALON'S VITALIA
possesses the following properties, which are guaranteed:
It restores to Gray Hair its original color in from 3 to 10 days.
It has no filthy sediment of sulphur or anything else.
It is as clear as Croton Water, and as harmless.
It does not stain the skin.
It will not soil the linen.
It does not contain any Nitrate of Silver.
It in no way resembles the so-called "Not-a-Dye" articles.
It has no filthy sediment to hide by a paper cover.
It is limpid as water, guaranteed harmless as the air.
It is pleasant for morning toilet.
It is guaranteed to be infallible.
Phalon's "Vitalia" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the directions being carefully observed.
PHALON'S VITALIA IS AS CLEAR AS WATER AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.
If your druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, inclosing $1, and we will forward it immediately.

SATURDAY, Oct. 9—P. M.

The Sales of Gold to-day were at 120⅞@120¾ @120⅞@120⅝ per cent., the fluctuations from Friday being small and the amount of business quite moderate. The market left off dull, although the Bankers were disposed to ask a fraction higher for Bills on London. The Banks gain on their Gold average of the week—from the Treasury and from Europe—$5,610,677. They lose $2,191,500 in Greenbacks, and have liquidated $4,460,676 in Loans, and paid off $9,900,833 on the general line of Deposits. The Treasury Office took in for the week $2,722,000 for Gold Customs, sold $2,000,000 Gold Coin, and paid out $227,774 for Gold Interest on the Public Debt.

The turn in Money at the close of the week is to 6 ⅌ cent. on call loan to the Brokers, although previous loans outstanding at 7 ⅌ cent. were not paid off. The opinion prevails that the sudden ease in supply announcing this Afternoon to difficulty in placing balances even at 6 ⅌ cent. is the result of the collapse in speculation ten days ago, not yet recovered from by new combinations to buy Stocks or Gold, and that this condition of things will not last very long. Meantime there is a little better currency for prime Merchant paper at 7 ⅌ cent. at Bank, and 7 to 10 on the Street.

The day was comparatively a quiet one in the Stock market. A fair amount of business was done in the Southern State Bonds and in the Railways, and generally at full prices, as from Friday, and in some instances at an advance. In the Public Bonds there was a tame feeling, the operations of the day closing steady. The following general quotations of the market were made in the afternoon as compared with Friday night:

The Philadelphia North American of this morning says:

The demand is firmer, and the trade generally has assumed a more cheerful appearance. A large amount of coal will be kept back, owing to the recent severe freshet, which will tend to still further stiffen the market, and impart a firmer feeling. While we should deeply regret to see higher prices, we are pleased to notice this decided improvement in the demand.

LAW REPORTS.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT—Oct. 5.

Mr. Justice FIELD was present to-day. The following cases, No. 103, from the District Court for the Western District of Arkansas, was taken up:

Archibald P. Scarlett, Administrator, &c., of Caldwell, deceased, Plaintiff in Error, vs. Byron W. Fuller.—The defendant here was a Lieutenant Colonel of the army, and acting in his military capacity seized, while stationed in Arkansas, a certain cotton, the property of the plaintiff, and, as it claimed, disposed of it in pursuance of law. Subsequently the defendant being within the jurisdiction of the Crawford County Circuit Court for the State, suit was brought against him by the plaintiff in error at the May term, 1866, in that Court. The defendant making no appearance, judgment for $4,000 was rendered against him. Afterward, and at the same term, defendant appeared and moved to set aside judgment, alleging a meritorious defence. He alleged a meritorious defence in the case, for the reason that at the time of the alleged trover he was a military officer in occupation, possession and disposal of the cotton as such officer, under directions of his superior military officer, by the laws of the United States; and not for his own use and benefit; that he was protected from prosecution by orders of the War Department, and by the laws of the United States; that the cotton was taken by him in his official capacity, and not in his private capacity; that he claims the action, the decision of the Circuit Court of the United States District Court for the Western District of that State, under the act of March 3, 1863, the writ of error prayed for Comes to dismiss the case from the State Court to the Circuit Court of the United States. The cause was accordingly removed, and, coming on for trial, plaintiff in error declined to plead to the merits, and, judgment being rendered against him by default, disclaiming the plea, with costs, and alleging "that the said Scarlett take nothing for his said claim." Pending the trial, and during term, he, plaintiff in error, moved his Court to dismiss the cause, exhibiting that the Court had no authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States to take jurisdiction of the matter, which being overruled, and judgment being rendered by default, an appeal was taken to the Court, the only question presented being the constitutionality of the 5th section of the act of March 3, 1863.

(In the part of argument in error it is suggested that this is a case where the Federal courts are given jurisdiction by the Constitution, and that the Federal and State courts have concurrent jurisdiction, but that Congress has the right to give, the Constitution has given the national tribunals but a certain class of cases to hear and decide, and to give these Courts jurisdiction of cases not in the Constitution, is to destroy the Constitution. Then the Constitution had called to mind the jurisdiction, there is no use for Congress, as well as the Courts, lives by and under the Constitution. Take away the last of Congress, and the Constitution is not impaired; but if Congress, in establishing new Courts, and conferred on them jurisdiction, or

SUPREME COURT.—IN THE MATTER of the application of the Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New-York relative to opening Seventieth-street, from Eighth-avenue to Central Park, in the City of New-York.

We, the undersigned, Commissioners of Estimate and Assessment in the above-entitled matter, hereby give notice to the owner or owners, occupant or occupants of all houses and lots and improved or unimproved lands affected thereby, and to all others whom it may concern, to wit:

That we have completed our estimate and assessment, and that all persons interested in these proceedings, or in any of the lands affected thereby, and who may be opposed to the same, do present their objections in writing, duly verified, to Edward Hogan, Esq., our Chairman, at the office of the Commissioners, No. 49 Nassau-street, (Room No. 42,) in the City of New-York, on the 9th day of October, 1869, at 2 o'clock, that we, the said Commissioners, will hear parties so objecting within the ten week days next after the said 9th day of October, 1869, and that we will meet for the purpose of completing our report, at our said office on each of said ten days, at 2 o'clock, P. M.

SECOND—That the district of the said estimate and assessment, comprises the entire city of New-York, and also the all the lands, tenements, and other hereditaments which were used by us in making our report, have been deposited in the Street Commissioner's office, in the City of New-York, there to remain until the twenty-seventh day of October, 1869.

THIRD—That the limits embraced by the assessment aforesaid are as follows, to-wit: All those lots, pieces or parcels of land, lying and being on both sides of One Hundred and Twenty-sixth street, between the Seventh-avenue and Eighth-avenue, and extending on either side of One Hundred and Twenty-sixth street half the distance to the next street thereto; and

FOURTH—That our report herein will be presented to the Supreme Court of the State of New-York, at the Chambers thereof, in the City of New-York, in the City Hall, in the City of New-York, on the first day of November, 1869, at the opening of the Court on said day, and that all persons interested in said report will be heard thereon, if a motion shall then and there be made to confirm the said report, or to vacate and set aside the same, or for any other relief in the premises, or for the confirmation of the same, or any other relief in the premises, or for the confirmation of the same, or any other relief in the premises, or for the confirmation of the same, or

THE RACES.

Second Day of the Jerome Park Fall Meeting.

A Brilliant and Fashionable Assemblage.

GLORIOUS WEATHER AND SPLENDID RACING.

"Harry Booth" the Winner of the Hurdle Race.

The Handicap Won by "General Duke"—The Champion Stakes by "Glenelg"—The Nursery Stakes by "Remorseless."

A more gloriously beautiful day than was yesterday for the perfect enjoyment of racing, the "sport of kings," was never witnessed. An atmosphere bright, warm and genial characterized the second day of the Jerome Park Meeting, and tempted thousands to patronise the Course and enjoy the pleasing excitement produced by the contests of the noble thoroughbreds. The drive through the beautiful Park, and along the noble Central-avenue, was yesterday one long uninterrupted cavalcade. Stately equipages, exquisitely-appointed four-in-hands, elegant carriages and showy teams following in endless succession from the City to the very gates of the Course. Nature looked resplendently lovely in her autumnal robes of scarlet, russet and gold, and the spectacle from the balcony of the Club House crowning the hill which overlooks the picturesque valley in which the race course is located, was indescribably charming. The attendance was unusually large, fashionable and select, and the grand stand presented a brilliant appearance during the afternoon; the rich and exquisitely tasteful toilets of the lady patronesses of the meeting increasing the attractiveness of the scene. The racing itself was remarkable for its excellence and exciting interest, most of the contests being unusually close and productive of intense gratification to the deeply-interested lookers-on. Indeed, a finer day's racing sport has never been witnessed at Jerome Park, and we may safely anticipate that the proceedings of the remaining three days of the meeting will be equally interesting and enjoyable. The track was in excellent order, although not so favorable for fast time as we have occasionally seen it at previous meetings. The management was perfect in every department, and the Club are deeply indebted to the invaluable services of Mr. THEODORE MOSS, of Wallack's Theatre, who had the superintendence of the ticket department, to the admirable success of the arrangements for the admission of visitors. The Jockey Club are entitled to the acknowledgements of the representatives of the Press for the thoughtful care which has influenced the arrangements for the securing of their convenience in providing a comfortable place on the grand stand for the discharge of their peculiar duties, and for the providing of which they are deeply indebted to Mr. A. C. MONSON, one of the Stewards of the meeting.

THE RACING.

The track was in admirable condition, although not so fast as we have seen it at some previous meetings. The initatory race of the day—the hurdle race—was one of the finest contested affairs we have ever witnessed, and elicited the well-deserved approbation and encomiums of the gratified spectators. The skill of the jockeys in this race was strikingly manifested, and it is difficult to say which was most worthy of admiration, the patience and coolness of the rider of Harry Booth, the winner, who reserved the power and speed of his horse to the final struggle, or the fine horsemanship of MIDGELY on Eminence, who, after losing his stirrups by another horse cannoning against him, leaped his horse over the hurdle in splendid style, still retaining his seat, and subsequently made a good race home with his opponents. The race for the handicap sweepstakes was a brilliant affair, and resulted in a splendid finish between General Duke and Nemesis, and had not the latter met with a disappointment on the home stretch turn, and was afterwards cannoned against in coming in up the straight, the result might have been altered for the black filly was fast catching the winner at every stride. In the Champion Stakes, Mr. BELMONT's Travers' Stakes winner, Glenelg, asserted his superiority over the three-year olds opposed to him most conclusively, and in claiming for him the distinction of being the best three-year old on the Eastern turf, barring Narragansett, we think we are not far mistaken. In Inverness, Mr. CARTER's imported filly, by Macaroni, out of a Faugh-a-Ballagh mare, he met a formidable opponent, and the forward running of the latter is the more remarkable from the fact that, having been amiss all the Summer, she has only been five weeks in steady training. The Nursery Stakes brought out those two magnificent two-year old fillies, and old opponents, Remorseless (a full sister to the flying Ruthless) and Nellie James, the imported daughter of the French-bred Goodwood Cup winner, Dollar, who had twice before, in the Flush Stakes and Saratoga Stakes, at the recent Saratoga meeting, met together, Mr. MORRIS' filly triumphing on both occasions. In this race, Princess was the representative of the Belmont stables, and it was a magnificent contest between the two, only won in the last two or three strides by Mr. MORRIS' promising young daughter of Eclipse and Barbarity, who, if she keeps well, will be a most formidable filly for the great Dinner Party Stakes at Baltimore next Fall. A word of commendation is due the Harlem Railroad Company, who not only ran their special trains with commendable punctuality, but provided carriages for the exclusive use of ladies and their attendant cavaliers. Under the admirable regulations of the railroad company, parties comprising ladies can visit Jerome Park with comfort and enjoyment by this route.

THE HURDLE RACE

was the first event on the card, and five horses were entered for the purse of $400, with the additional inducement of $100 for the second horse. The distance was one mile and three-quarters, and six hurdles were to be leaped in going over the course. The entries and weights (welter) were as follows: R. SHEA's br. h. Eminence, 156 pounds; Jas. THOMPSON's br. m. Lobelia, 148 pounds; D. MCDANIELS' b. h. Julius, 148 pounds; C. LITTLEFIELD's b. g. Mitchell, 139 pounds; and H. B. TODD's b. h. Harry Booth, 148 pounds. With the exception of Eminence, all the rest are experienced hurdlers, accustomed to the work, and a more than usually interesting race was anticipated. These expectations were fully realized, for it proved the finest and most exciting hurdle race that ever was witnessed in America, producing the highest gratification among the vast assemblage. Harry Booth, on the strength of his previous distinguished performances in this line of racing business, was made the favorite, and in one pool, which is a fair specimen of the majority sold, he brought $225; Lobelia, $110; Eminence, $200; Mitchell, $110, and Julius, $100. DOWNING rode the favorite; HUGHEY GRIFFIN was on Mitchell; ROCHE on Lobelia; MIDGELY on Eminence, and a colored rider on Julius. They got off well together, Eminence having first shown some little temper and jumped the rails into the inclosure. Mitchell took the lead, with Eminence second, over the first hurdle, which was placed across the course at the foot of the Club House hill; Booth, Lobelia and Julius following in succession; and all jumping the obstacle in close style. The second hurdle was half way along the three-quarter stretch, and Mitchell took it two lengths ahead of Eminence, who was three lengths before the favorite, Julius being last. The third hurdle was located half way up the quarter stretch, and Mitchell still led as he went skimming like a bird over it, with Harry Booth, who had passed Eminence, second. A fine struggle for the lead now ensued, and as they swept under the string Lobelia, Booth and Mitchell were all together, Eminence and Julius a couple of lengths behind. As they approached the hurdle at the base of the bluff, where the horses were all together, something cannoned against Eminence, knocking him out of his stride, throwing MIDGELY into his horse's neck, and losing his stirrups. This lost him his forward position, for he was last over the hurdle, which MIDGELY took without his feet in the stirrups, retaining his seat in splendid style. Lobelia now assumed the lead, and the fifth hurdle on the lower stretch being down, the road was clear for all, until they arrived at the last hurdle half way up the homestretch. Here Mitchell was in front, leading a clear length over the last obstacle, Lobelia and Booth jumping it almost simultaneously. When fairly over, the final struggle commenced between Mitchell and Harry Booth, whose rider had saved him for this last set-to. It was a brilliant finish to a magnificent race, but the old horse triumphed over the young one, and when they passed under the string, Harry Booth was half a length in advance of Mitchell, Lobelia third, Eminence fourth and Julius last. Time—3:50.

SUMMARY.

JEROME PARK COURSE, SATURDAY, Oct. 9.—Hurdle race, purse $400, for all ages; $100 additional to the second horse, if three or more start; one mile and three-quarters, over six hurdles.

H. B. Todd's b. h. Harry Booth, 6 years, Lexington, dam Blonde, 148 pounds 1
C. Littlefield's b. h. Mitchell, 5 years, Mickey Free, dam by Sovereign, 139 pounds 2
James Thompson's br. m. Lobelia, aged, Bonny Scotland, dam Captivia, 148 pounds 3
R. Shea's br. h. Eminence, 4 years, Lexington, dam sister to Vandal, 156 pounds 4
D. McDaniels' b. h. Julius, aged, Lexington, dam Julia, 148 pounds 5
Time—3:50.

THE HANDICAP SWEEPSTAKES

was the next event. The distance was one mile and a quarter, and sixteen horses out of the twenty-four entered had accepted the weights of the handicapper. The entrance money was $50 each, play or pay, with $10 only if declared; the Club adding $600, and the second horse receiving twenty-five per cent. of the stakes. Eleven horses came to the post, viz., J. O'DONNELL's ch. h. General Duke, 106 pounds, and his br. h. R. B. Connolly, 111 pounds; R. W. WALDEN's ch. h. Metairie, 110 pounds, and his b. m. Sleety, 106 pounds; C. LITTLEFIELD's ch. m. Hira, 107 pounds; M. H. SANFORD's b. h. Northumberland, 103 pounds, and his b. f. La Polka, 100 pounds; HUNTER & TRAVERS' blk. f. Nemesis, 101 pounds; D. MCDANIELS' b. f. Albuera, 99 pounds; PURDY & WITHERS' ch. f. Tasmania, 87 pounds, and A. BELMONT's b. f. Attraction, 87 pounds. This was a large field, and the betting was heavy and spirited. General Duke had been suffering from a quarter crack a few days before, and had been lame, but still he had done a fair amount of work and looked well, having evidently recovered from his lameness. Still his trainer, R. THOMPSON, preferred the chances of his stable companion, R. B. Connolly, who certainly looked fit to run for a man's life. Tasmania had a host of sanguine friends, as had also Nemesis, while the Walden stable were sweet on their pair, Metairie and Sleety. In the pools Mr. O'DONNELL's entry was the favorite, realising in one, $1,000; Nemesis, $450; Tasmania, $375; WALDEN's entry, $210; the field, $250. The start was from the three-quarter pole, and after three or four failures the flag fell, all getting off well together, except Metairie. As they passed under the string R. B. Connolly was leading, with La Polka second, Tasmania third, Nemesis fourth, and the rest in a ruck. Rounding the turn their positions became more definable, and as they went past the quarter pole Connolly was still in the lead, cutting out the running at a good pace, with La Polka at his quarters, General Duke next, Tasmania, Metairie and Nemesis the next lot. In this order they skirted the Club House hill and disappeared behind the bluff. When they again came in sight Connolly was still in the van, La Polka as before, his immediate attendant, General Duke, at her quarters under a strong pull, and Metairie next. As they swept around the turn into the homestretch, Connolly was done, and his rider pulled out for his stable companion, General Duke, to take his place on the inside, which he did, assuming the lead at this point. Here Nemesis met with a double disappointment, for she went wide on the outside, and was cannoned against by another horse, but her rider, steadying her, brought her out with a tremendous rush in pursuit of General Duke. The rider of the latter, seeing danger, took up his whip and roused his horse, but Nemesis was steadily gaining at every stride, and if they had had twenty lengths further to go the issue might have been different. As it was, after a splendidly contested race General Duke won by three-quarters of a length in 2:14¾. Nemesis was second and Metairie third; the rest unplaced.

SAME DAY.—Handicap Sweepstakes for all ages; $50 each, play or pay, and only $10 if declared; $500 added; the second horse to receive 25 per cent. of the stakes; one mile and a quarter.

J. O'Donnell's ch. h. General Duke, 4 years, Lexington, dam Lida, 106 pounds 1
Hunter & Travers' blk. m. Nemesis, 4 years, Eclipse, dam Echo, 101 pounds 2
R. W. Walden's ch. h. Metairie, 5 years, Star Davis, dam Kaimee, 110 pounds 3
J. O'Donnell's br. h. R. B. Connolly, 5 years, Lexington, dam Lucy Fowler, 111 pounds 0
C. Littlefield's ch. m. Hira, 5 years, Lexington, dam Regina, 107 pounds 0

M. H. Sanford's b. h. Northumberland, 4 years, Lexington, dam Novice, 103 pounds 0
M. H. Sanford's b. m. La Polka, 4 years, Lexington, dam Dance, 100 pounds 0
D. McDaniels' b. m. Albuera, 4 years, Jeff. Davis, dam Minnie, 99 pounds 0
Purdy & Withers' ch. f. Tasmania, 4 years, Australian, dam Matty Green, 87 pounds 0
A. Belmont's b. f. Attraction, 3 years, Balrowrie, dam Maud, 87 pounds 0
Time—2:14¾.

THE CHAMPION STAKES

was the third race, and was for an unusually rich prize, the stake being worth $6,500 net. It was for three-year olds exclusively, $500 each, half forfeit, with $1,500 added, the second horse receiving $600 out of the stakes; mile heats. There were thirty-eight entries and six starters: Mr. BELMONT's imported b. c. Glenelg, by Oiandel, dam Balta; Mr. LITTELL's blk. c. Onga, by Eclipse, dam by Revenue; R. W. CAMERON's imported b. f. Inverness by Macaroni, (winner of the Derby,) dam Alfreda by Faugh a Ballagh; L. G. MORRIS' br. f. Violet, by Balrownie, dam Verbena by Knight of St. George; PURDY & WITHERS' ch. c. Vespucius, by Planet, dam Columbia; and T. G. BACON's ch. f. by Bulletin, dam Seabreeze. Glenelg had won the Travers Stakes at Saratoga in such easy style that he had a host of backers for this race. He sold for $600, Vespucius $210, Inverness $135, and the field, $65.

FIRST HEAT.—Vespucius showed considerable temper; Onga jumped off with the lead, with Violet and the Seabreeze filly next, and the favorite, who was slow in getting off, last. Onga still led at the quarter, and as they went around the hill, he was still in front, Violet second, and Inverness third; the favorite still last. On the lower stretch Vespucius took second place, and coming round the turn into the last quarter, he deprived Onga of the lead, and seemed to be winning in a canter, when GILPATRICK came with a lightning rush on Inverness, but too late, for after a brilliant finish, Vespucius won by a short neck; Onga, third. Time—1:48¾.

SECOND HEAT.—Glenelg still continued the favorite against the field, notwithstanding he had lost the first heat. He this time got away in front, with Inverness second, Onga third and Vespucius fourth; the latter at the start knocking the Sea Breeze filly down, owing to the clumsiness of his rider. At the quarter pole Glenelg was a length before Inverness, who was two lengths before Onga; Vespucius bolting in the direction of his stable, and losing a great deal of ground. Glenelg maintained his lead throughout, and galloped home an easy winner by two lengths; Inverness second, six lengths before Onga; Vespucius, Violet and Seabreeze fully distanced. Time—1:48¾.

THIRD HEAT.—Betting $100 to $65 on Glenelg, who led from start to finish; Inverness beating Onga by MR. LENGTHS for second place. Time—1:48.

SAME DAY.—The Champion Stakes of $500 each, half forfeit, $1,500 added, for three-year olds; second horse to receive $600 out of the stakes; mile heats.

A. Belmont's b. c. Glenelg, (Oiandel, dam Balta,) 110 pounds 1 1 1
R. W. Cameron's b. f. Inverness, (Macaroni, dam Alfreda,) 98 pounds 2 2 2
M. A. Littelle's ch. c. Onga, (imp. Eclipse, dam by Revenue,) 110 pounds 3 3 3
L. G. Morris' br. f. Violet, (Balrowrie, dam Verbena,) 98 pounds ..... 4 dis.
T. G. Bacon's ch. f. by Bulletin, dam Seabreeze, 98 pounds ..... 5 dis.
Purdy & Withers' ch. c. Vespucius, (Planet, dam Columbia,) 110 pounds ..... 1 dis.
Time—1:48¾, 1:48¾, 1:50.

THE NURSERY STAKES

of $50 each, play or pay, with $1,500 added, was the last race. It was for two-year olds exclusively, the second horse receiving $300 out of the stakes; one mile. There were thirty-four entries, of which the following came to the post: A. BELMONT's Nellie James and Princess, F. MORRIS' Remorseless, T. W. DOWNELL's Midday, M. H. SANFORD's Grecian Bend and The Nun, Mr. JEROME's Glenbush, Mr. LITTELL's Balrownie colt, dam Emma Johnston, and J. W. PRINCE's ch. c. by Norfolk, dam by The Cricket. In the pools Remorseless's entry sold for $100, MORRIS $25, DOWNELL $50, the field $25. Remorseless and Princess got off first, Glenbush and Nellie James next. At the quarter pole Princess was a length ahead of Remorseless, Nellie James third, and as they went around the hill two lengths separated the first and second, which Midday here took third place. Coming into sight Princess was seen in possession of the lead, two lengths before Remorseless, who led Midday the same distance. Coming up the homestretch a splendid race ensued between Remorseless and Princess, the former getting her head in front in the last few strides, and winning a brilliant race by half a length; Princess second, and Midday third. Time—1:47¾.

SAME DAY.—The Nursery Stakes of $50 each, play or pay; $1,500 added for two-year olds; second horse to receive $300 out of the stakes; one mile.

F. Morris' ch. f. Remorseless by Eclipse, dam Berbarity 1
A. Belmont's ch. f. Princess by Lexington, dam Filagree 2
R. W. Dorsville's b. f. Midday by Eclipse, dam Hibernia 3
Glenbush, Grecian Bend, The Nun, Nellie James, Balrownie colt and Merry Thought also ran, but were not placed.
Time—1:47¾.

BARON DE REVIERRE.

Affidavits on Behalf of Defendant—The Plaintiff Alleged to Be a Person of Vile Character.

In the case of HELENE STILLE against Baron HENRI DE REVIERRE, a report of which has already appeared in the TIMES, a motion was noticed for yesterday in the Superior Court, Special Term, to set aside the order of arrest heretofore granted against the defendant. At the hour of hearing, the counsel for the plaintiff made application for an adjournment, in order to be afforded an opportunity to prepare affidavits to meet those on which the motion was based. Mr. JAMES HERDERSON, counsel for the defendant, thereupon announced that rather than consent to an adjournment he would withdraw his motion, reserving the right to renew it on additional affidavits. In the affidavits served with the notice of motion, the defendant swears that the statements in the affidavit of the plaintiff heretofore published are totally false.

He further swears that he left Paris in the month of April, 1865, for Madrid, in Spain, accompanied by his mother-in-law, now deceased, and his wife, and arrived in Madrid the same month; that in the latter part of May, 1865, he left Madrid with his family and proceeded to Seville and Cadiz, and then proceeded to Portugal, where he arrived in June, 1865. On the 12th of January, 1866, he left for Bordeaux, in France, where he arrived on Jan. 19, 1866, and, as will also appear by his passport from the French Minister at Lisbon, countersigned by the official authorities at Bordeaux, that he became acquainted and with the plaintiff in a railroad car between Paris and Bordeaux, in the latter part of the year 1864, she then and there stating to deponent that she was entirely destitute of money or means, and was endeavoring to join her husband, who had left for America. She had two children with her, one of her about 14 years of age, the other a baby only a few months old, and on hearing her statement he gave her some money to pay her traveling expenses. He again saw her in Paris in the year 1866, when she applied to him to furnish her with the means to join her husband, whom she then stated was in Australia, but as soon as she obtained the money she made use of it to take passage on board of the steamer Panama bound to Aspinwall, and upon which he, the defendant, was traveling on his way to Chili; that she followed him to Valparaiso, in Peru, and remained until he (defendant) came back from Chili, some six months thereafter, and ever since that time has systematically followed up, annoyed, threatened, and attempted to blackmail him, and that he was obliged, in the year 1867, to have her arrested and brought before the Commissaire de Police in the City of Paris, where she was bound over to keep the peace; he further says that she has been residing in the City of New-York for the past year, during which time she has made several attempts at blackmailing him, knowing that he was a married man and engaged in important business with the Chilian and Bolivian Governments, with which he has contracted for 1,500,000 tons of guano; that in the year 1868 she (the plaintiff) absconded from Paris leaving numerous creditors unpaid, and was then sued by said creditors in the Police Correctionelle Court of the City of Paris for obtaining goods under false pretences.

EMILIE ARNOUX DE REVIERRE, the wife of defendant, swears that she was married to defendant at Madrid, in Spain, in the year 1865, that she has read the affidavit of defendant, and that so far as the same relates to the defendant taking his mother-in-law and her (the deponent) to Madrid, Seville, Lisbon and Bordeaux, it is true.

LEVINIA L. WISE swears that she knows the plaintiff, with whom she became acquainted in this City in the year 1865; that she (the plaintiff) then went under the name of ROSE STILLE, representing herself as the wife of GEORGE STILLE, of St. Louis, Mo., and that she had come to this City about a year prior thereto, and on her arrival had put up at the St. Nicholas Hotel in this City; that subsequently she (the plaintiff) resided at the Metropolitan Hotel, where she lived and cohabited with sundry persons of this City, those names are mentioned in deponent's affidavit, and became afterward the mistress of another person of this City, with whom she went to Europe, where she became acquainted with the Due DE MORNY, and represented herself as his wife, and as the deponent believes, was so received in such. She further swears that the plaintiff was a frequent visitor of a house of ill-fame kept by Mrs. VAN NESS, then in Houston-street, when first she (the plaintiff) came to this City; that in the year 1863 she (deponent) was informed by GEO. STILLE, now deceased, that the plaintiff had basely deceived him by divers acts and devices, and induced him to believe that he was the father of one of her children, and thereby obtained large sums of money from him, and that from what she knows of the plaintiff, she would not believe her under oath.

The Judge directed a formal order to be entered discontinuing the motion, as consented to by defendant's counsel.

Second Game for the Championship between the Eckfords and Atlantics—Defeat of the Latter.

The return game for the championship between the Eckfords and Atlantics was played yesterday afternoon at the Union grounds in the presence of a very large crowd of spectators. Both nines appearing in full force, an exciting match was looked for, and for the first four innings the playing was very close, the score standing four to three. In the fifth inning, however, the Eckfords launched out with the bat and made nine runs before being put out. They struck heavily and safely, and were repeatedly assisted by the poor fielding of their opponents. The Atlantics were unable to pull up, and could only keep the game even during its continuance. In the first match, when the Eckfords were defeated, the Atlantics batted MARTIN's balls with ease, but yesterday PINKHAM pitched with great success.

One more game has yet to be played between these clubs before the championship is decided. The following is the summary:

Umpire—Mr. FLANLY, of the Mutuals.

To-morrow the Atlantics and Athletics, of Philadelphia, play at the Capitoline Grounds.

Carleton's Fifth-Avenue Book and Stationery Store.

Mr. G. W. CARLETON, the well-known publisher, has recently opened the North mansion, at the corner of Broadway and Fifth-avenue, as a book and stationery store. The property was purchased by Mr. CARLETON, a few months ago, who immediately proceeded to tear out the interior compartments and turn the whole of the lower floor into a grand saloon-room, 100 feet by 20. The beautiful walnut wainscoting, doors, cornices, &c., are painted of dark chocolate color, relieved by panels of darker tint, and narrow beads of black and gold. The ceiling is frescoed in the Pompeian style, the cornices being of bright blue. The colors used in this room have been well chosen, and the effect is rich and imposing. The room is further adorned by fine bronze statues of JULIUS CÆSAR, GOETHE, KING OTHO, MICHAEL ANGELO, MOZART, BEETHOVEN, MINERVA, &c. The decorations of the apartment are said to have cost over $14,000.

The location chosen by Mr. CARLETON for his new store is one of the finest in the City, and being situated in the uptown fashionable quarter, will doubtless command the patronage of the wealthier classes.

SUNDAY NOTES.

MR. F. W. FARNHAM, owner of the Excelsior Knitting Mills at Troy, is building a new free church for operatives, near Ida Hill, to cost about $60,000. A good mission is flourishing here. St. John's has been improved this Summer at a cost of about $4,000. St. Paul's is building a new chapel in the rear of the church, with class rooms, library, sewing rooms, &c., at a cost of $25,000.

The monthly report of the New-York City Mission shows the following figures: 46 missionaries; 8 missions; 8 mission Sunday schools; 1 reading room; 12 temperance meetings; 12 open air meetings; 4,726 missionary visits; 377 prayer meetings; 209 sermons; 209 families and 800 persons visited; $600 expended in relieving the worthy and industrious poor; and 100,000 tracts and papers given away.

A Massachusetts paper says that there is a growing tendency among the churches of all denominations in Boston and vicinity toward free seats. At the Old South the galleries have recently been made free. Rev. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE's new church is free in all parts, and his parishioners find that they can raise more money in this way than by the old way of letting. One of the Cambridge churches, which last year raised only $1,400 from its rentals, has got over $2,000 this year, with free seats.

The incumbent of St. Matthias', Liverpool, Rev. E. MAWTON JONES, has announced his intention of rendering the church entirely free to all. "It is my full intention," he says, "to abolish pew-rents in my church at the end of this month, and on and after the first Sunday in July, to throw it open to all, having the offertory at each service." "I hope (he adds) the time is not far distant when the unscriptural practice of receiving pew-rents (in my opinion a most iniquitous tax) will be done away with forever, and the offertory, for which we have Apostolic sanction, be everywhere substituted. Until this is done, we must, I fear, look in vain for full churches."

Le Temps says the noble and courageous answer of Father HYACINTHE will create an immense effect, appearing, as it has, on the eve of a great council. It is truly a sign of the times. Le Siecle is of opinion that the attitude of the eloquent and earnest preacher must exercise great influence in the present crisis of the Church. The Journal des Debats looks upon the religious situation as one fraught with serious consequences. It is said that the coming council at Rome will meet only to ratify the decision of a most ultramontane committee, but the attitude of certain German and American Bishops, and the complaints of illustrious French ecclesiastics, show that the labors of the council will not be so easy and direct as was anticipated. If the syllabus triumphs, it will be with a struggle, and the triumph can only be ephemeral.

The Liberal Christian says that Gates Ajar made an association of ministers at Woburn lively by furnishing a fresh subject for discussion; one-half admired and the other half abominated it, and while the former wanted it put in every family and library, the latter wanted it put under ban. The jar continued until evening closed the gates and sent the wranglers home.

The Hartford Christian Secretary has the following:

"Against broadcloth as a common article of clothing, business men urge many objections. It is too 'expensive,' or too 'heavy,' or too 'liable to soil.' Are these reasons against it less valid when they happen to be made by ministers? But in addition to them there is another reason why any uniform dress for clergymen is objectionable. It makes them appear as a distinct class among their fellowmen. 'You may tell he's a parson by the cut of his coat,' is a remark often made. The remark may be coarse, but the fact indicated by it is not pleasant. And I would ask if in these days of popery and ritualism it is desirable to do any thing which shall convey the idea that ministers of the gospel are, save in office, anything more than Christians? It seems to me one of the most needful truths they have to keep before the minds of the present generation is, that they are no more priests of God than any others who believe in Christ. If therefore by the adoption of a peculiar style of dress they help to obscure the truth, let it be changed."

A London journalist thus disposes of a bit of pious flunkeyism:

"The Record hints that Lady PALMERSTON was converted before her death to Evangelical principles by her son-in-law, the Earl of SHAFTESBURY, and while showering very characteristic but unevangelical applause on her Ladyship's qualities as a woman of the world, indulges in a fond hope that the study of a Bible given her by her son-in-law, and marked by him to draw attention to his favorite passages, may make her almost equally successful as a woman of the next world. We cannot adequately express our disgust at these indecent attempts to cast the horoscope of souls by the publication of these spiritual anecdotes intended as straws to tell the world how the evangelical wind blew on the spirits of fashionable persons prior to their decease. There is only one defence in this sort of thing, and we are willing to hope it is the true one. Does not the Record half believe that a good word uttered for a departed soul in the genuinely evangelical Press, may perhaps be taken into account as a mitigating circumstance before a higher tribunal? On that view, these prurient little forecasts would be charitable, though superstitious. On any other, they are simply disgusting."

A Society of Catholics has been formed in Baden to "resist the aggressions of Rome," and is founding branches throughout Rhenish Prussia.

The Spectator says that General BUTLER's elaborate cross-examination of Mrs. STOWE's evidence is, we take it, rather to be set down to dislike of the New-England party of virtue than to any uncontrollable sympathy with Lord BYRON; though, we dare say, among the rebels against Puritanism in the Puritan States, there are not a few who indulge a passion for the one modern Titan who has covered his rebellion with a cloud of glory.

An English editor, referring to the refusal of the Pope, through Archbishop MANNING to hear Dr. CUMMING before the Council, says: "Dr. CUMMING will think it a feather in his cap to have been written of by the Pope, and we shall have to bear the unhappy consequences of his elation."

The American Catholic Bishops have been regarded as the surest support of the Pope in all his reactionary policy; but the Figaro, of Paris, asserts that fifty American Bishops will support M. DUPANLOUP, Bishop of Orleans, in his defence of liberal opinions before the Council.

A seminary has been founded near Berlin, Prussia, to educate preachers and teachers for the German emigrants in North America. It is called the Sternenhaus (Star House) after the banner of the United States.

A French savan, named Dr. PAGADE, has discovered a method by which he can "telegraph" a moral and studious disposition or habit into a child, displacing any normal viciousness or indolence he may have inherited from his parents. The Lyceum of the Prince Imperial at Vannes is about to experiment with this discovery.

Dr. S. H. TYNG has written a letter to Drs. MUHLENBERG, J. COTTON SMITH, NEWTON, and the remaining committee of Low Churchmen on the subject of revision of the Prayer Book, decidedly deprecating the project and refusing to aid in it.

The refusal of Dr. ROBINSON to allow the use of the American Chapel to the friends of Rev. Dr. OSGOOD, who desired to hear that gentleman preach when he was in Paris, is characterized by the Independent "as a lamentable exhibition of sectarian manners and bigotry." The Independent closes its article with the following: "We say, out upon all such narrowness, in whatever denomination it may show itself. It uses the name of Christianity only to bring it, if it were possible, into disgrace. How much more noble appears the liberality of Father HYACINTHE, a Romanist, than the narrowness of Dr. ROBINSON, a Protestant!"

Mrs. VAN COTT, the only female licensed preacher among the Methodists, is preaching with success in Chicopee Falls, Mass.

The Norwegians have increased so fast in this country that a Western publisher is preparing to issue a large Commentary on the New Testament in that language. Among the Mormons, who some time since were very prolific, only four new wives have been lately given to Brigham Young, and he has greatly rebuked the harlots of the Park, and the grass and shrubs now look as green and vicious as they did weeks ago. The officers of yesterday were well attended. Here private equipages were driven through the Park than have been seen for many days past.

A Mean Robbery.

ALONZO MERRITT, heretofore of a good character, was yesterday taken before Justice LEDWITH by Roundsman RANDALL, of the Fifteenth Precinct, on a charge of stealing a lot of linen sheets and under wear, valued at $200, from MIGUEL F. CRUZ, of No. 120 East Eleventh-street. The property, having been found in his possession, he was committed for trial.
